Aurora Borealis

a variety of colours, from a pale red or yellow to a deep red or blood colour; and in the northern latitudes serve to illuminate the earth and cheer the gloom of long winter nights. The appearance of the aurora borealis so exactly resembles the effects of artificial electricity that there is every reason to believe that their causes are identical. When electricity passes through rarefied air it exhibits a diffused luminous stream which has all the characteristic appearances of the aurora, and hence it is highly probable that this natural phenomenon is occasioned by the passage of electricity through the upper regions of the atmosphere. The influence of the aurora upon the magnetic needle is now considered as an ascertained fact, and the connection between it and magnetism is further evident from the fact that the beams or coruscations issuing from a point in the horizon west of north are frequently observed to run in the magnetic meridian. At the same time, a luminous arch is occasionally seen stretching across the heavens, and crossing the magnetic meridian at right angles. The aurora borealis is said to be frequently accompanied by sound, which is variously described as resembling the rustling of pieces of silk against each other, or the sound of wind against the flame of a candle. — Aurora australis, the aurora of the southern hemisphere, quite a similar phenomenon to that of the north. — Aurora polaris, polar aurora, the aurora of either the northern or the southern hemisphere.

Auto da Fé (a-to-da-fé), a. pl. Autos da Fé (a-to-da-fé). [Pg. See Auto da Fé.] The Portuguese term equivalent to the Spanish auto de fe (which see).

Auto da Fé (a-to-da-fé), a. pl. Autos da Fé (a-to-da-fé). [Sp. lit. act (in the sense of decree, judgment, sentence) of faith—auto—da action, an act, de of, and fé=f. idea, faith.] 1 A judgment of the Spanish Inquisition. 2 A public solemnity formerly held by the courts of the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal and their dependencies at the execution of heretics condemned to death. Amid the tolling of bells the doomed were brought out from prison, barefoot, clad in a robe painted with hideous figures (called a cofrase, sp. cofrades), with painted caps on their heads, and conducted in the midst of a procession of clergy and lay familiars of the Inquisition (many of the latter being men of the highest rank), with the flag of the institution borne before them, their wrists painted with terrible symbols, bound, and amid many other grisly accompaniments, to the church of the Dominicans, where, after a sermon on the true faith, they were delivered over to the secular power by which they were shortly brought to the place of execution and burned to death. The king, or the highest official of the neighbourhood, generally lent the authority of his presence to the solemnity. The last auto da fé took place in the middle of the last century—a common of the Inquisition.

Autodynamic (a-to-din'am'ik), a. [Gr. autos, self, and dynamics, powerful.] A word used in the name of a kind of machine called autodynamic elevator, that is, a machine for raising water in which the weight of a falling column of water is made to raise a smaller column to a height above the source. See DI WATER.

Autogenial (a-to-je-ni'al), a. [See Autogenesis.] Self-generated, autogenous. Waterhouse.

Autogenous (a-to-je-ni-us), a. Same as Autogenous.

Autogenesis (a-to-je-ni-us), n. [Gr. autos, self, and genesis, to generate;] Self-produced, self-generated, produced independently, especially, in some developed from an independent centre, as of constitution.

The generation and growth of the organism are autogenous, while other organisms are autogenous. Quinn.

—Autogenous or autogenous coloring, the process of uniting pieces of metal by the fusion of part of their own substance.

Autograph (a-to-graf), n. [Gr. autos self, and grapho, writing;] 1 A person's own handwriting, an original manuscript or signature. 2 A machine which writes of itself, an autographic pen.

Autograph (a-to-graf), n. Written by one's self in one's own handwriting.

It appears from the autograph letters of the subject, General de la Fayette, that he found a quite impossible to obtain funds of paying the troops even for the next month. Sp. Reviewer.

Autographal (a-to-graf'al), a. Autographic. Boissac.

Autographic, Autographism (a-to-graf'ik, a-to-graf'ik-al), a. 1 Pertaining or relating to an autograph or one's own handwriting, an autographic authority, autographic evidence. 2 Relating to or used in the process of autography, an autographic ink, autographic paper. 3 Self-recording on an autographic telegraph, an instrument for transmitting a telegraphic dispatch written in insulating ink upon a metallic paper and reproducing it with absolute exactness on another prepared paper. The instrument may be used for transmitting portraits.

Autography (a-to-graf'i), n. 1 That branch of the science of diplomacy which treats of autographs. 2 A person's own handwriting. See Autograph. 3 A person to lithography by which a writing or drawing is transferred from paper to stone.

Automatal (a-tom-a-tal), a. Same as Automat. (Rare).

Automata (a-to-ma-tha), n. [Gr. automata, autos, self, and matheo, make, to learn;] One who is self-taught. (Rare).

Automatism, Automatism (a-to-ma-this, a-to-ma-this), n. [See Automatism.] 1 Belonging to an automaton; having the power of self-motion, self-acting, an automata machinery. 2 Conducted or carried on by self-acting machinery.

It is in our modern cities and the cities that automata operations are designed to meet advantage. Mac.

3 Not voluntary, not depending on the will, instinctive applied to animal actions.

Let me briefly review some of our other automata actions. In the act of breathing, which properly begins at the back of the throat, the tongue lays hold of the food and carries it down into the stomach. We are quite unconscious of its passage thither unless we have taken a larger drink or something better or colder than ordinary. This is an instance of purely automatic action. Dr. Carpenter.

—Automatic theory, name and definition.

Automatism (a-tom-a-tis), n. 1 Automatic action.

In considering the body as the instrument of the mind I shall show you, first, the large system of automaticity in the human body. Dr. Carpenter.

2 The doctrine that animals are a kind of automata, held and maintained more especially by Descartes.

Automatist (a-tom-a-tist), n. 1 One who makes automata. 2 One who believes in automatism.

Automaton (a-tom-a-ton), n. pl. Automata, Automatons (a-tom-a-ton, a-tom-a-ton), [Gr. automaton, acting of one's own will, self-moving, autos, self, and matheo, to make after, to move;] 1 That which is self-moving or has the power of spontaneous movement. 2 A grand and admirable as automata to the world. Anglo. Specifically, 3 A self-acting machine or one which is actuated in such a manner as to carry on for some time certain movements without the aid of external impulses. In this respect clocks and watches, with a vast number of machines employed in cotton, silk, and other factories, may be denominated automata, but the term more specifically denotes an apparatus in which the purposely created power is made to imitate the arbitrary or voluntary motions of living beings, such as men, horses, birds, fishes, &c.

Is not an automaton? Well, of course, there is a self-moving being, and in that sense he is an automaton. But the word automaton as we use it, has a different significance. It means a structure which moves by a mechanism, and which can only move in a certain way. Dr. Carpenter.

—Automaton, indeed, a machine for weighing phantoms and coin, and carrying the pieces automatically according to their weight, as full light, or heavy.

Automatons (a-tom-a-ton), n. Automata.

Clocks or automata organs observe no distinction of time, have no sensation in seconds, minutes, or hours. Dr. Carpenter.

Automatize, Automatize (a-tom-a-tize, a-tom-a-tize), v. [Gr. automaton, a machine;] A name sometimes given to phantoms, from the fact that it contains a large proportion of oxide of zinc, though it has no resemblance to zinc. See CHEMISTRY.

Automorphism (a-to-mor'fiz), n. [Gr. autos, self, and morphe, form;] Framed or enclosed after the pattern or form of one's self.

The conception which one frames of another's mind is inevitably more or less after the pattern of his own mind; to automorphize, and in proportion to the extent of which he has in frame a conception derived from his own, his automorphic interpretation is likely to be wide of the truth. Dr. Carpenter.

Automonian (a-to-mo-ni-an), a. Pertaining to automony.

Automonic (a-to-mo-ni), n. Relating to automony having the power of self-government, autonomic.

Autonomous (a-to-mo-ni), n. [Gr. autos, self, and nomos, law;] Independent in government, having the right of self-government. See Autonomy.

Autonomy (a-tu-mo-ni), n. [Gr. autos, self, and nomos, law;] 1 The power or right of self-government, whether in a province or city which elects its own magistrates and makes its own laws, or in an individual who lives according to his own will.

There was nothing in the treaty of Adrianople that really interfered with the autonomy of the Christians. Latham.

2 In the philosophy of Kant, the sovereignty of reason in the sphere of morals.

Autophag (a-to-fag), n. pl. [Gr. autos, self, and phago, to eat;] Birds which have the habit of eating their own flesh as soon as a statement itself independent of external evidence or corroboration. [Rare.]

Autoplasty (a'to-plas-ti), n. [Gr. autos, self, and plasis, to form.] In surg. a term for an operation by which lesions, accompanied with loss of substance, are repaired by means of healthy parts taken from their neighbourhood and made to supply the deficiency.

Autopsia (a-top'si-a), n. [Gr., from autos, self, and opsis, sight.] Personal observation.

It is no small undertaking for a man . . . to begin a natural history from his own autopsia.

Gilbert White.

Autopsia, Autopsical (a-top'sik, a-top'alk-al), a. Same as Autopsia. [Rare.]

Autopsy (a-top'si), n. (See AUTOPSIA.) 1. Personal observation; ocular view. 'Autopsy convinces us that it hath this use.'

Ray. — 2. In med. post-mortem examination; inspection of the body after death to discover the cause and seat of the disease of which the person died. 'The autopsy revealed nothing.' Latham.

Autoptic, Autoptical (a-top'tik, a-top'tik-al), a. Seen with one's own eyes; relating to or based on autopsy or personal observation; as, autoptic evidence. 'Evincing by autoptical experience.' Evelyn.

Autoptically (a-top'tik-al-ly), adv. By means of ocular view or one's own observation.

That the galaxy is a meteor, was the account of Aristotle; but the telescope hath autoptically confuted it.

Glanville.

Autot (a'tor), n. [See AUTHOR.] A first beginner or cause; an AUTHOR.

The serpent autot was, Eve did proceed; Adam not autot, suctor was indeed. Piscers.

Autoschediastical (a'to-skē-di-as-tik-al), a. [Gr. prefix auto, and skēdiastēs, off-hand, hastily.] Slight; hasty; not fully considered. Dean Martin. [Rare.]

Autostari (a'to-si-tā-ri), n. pl. [Gr. autos, self, and stōs, nourishment.] An order of double monsters, in which two equally developed individuals are joined, as by the umbilicus. The Siamese twins are a well-known example.

Autotypography (a'to-ti-pog-ra-fi), n. [Gr. prefix auto, self, and E. typography.] A process resembling nature-printing, by which drawings are impressed on a metal plate, from which copies may be taken for printing.

Autumn (a'tum), n. [L. autumnus, contracted from autumnus, the season of increase, from augo, autum, to increase.] The third season of the year, or the season between summer and winter. Astronomically it begins at the autumnal equinox, when the sun enters Libra, 23d September, and ends at the winter solstice, 21st December, when the sun enters Capricorn; but in popular language autumn is generally regarded as comprising August, September, and October. 'Used figuratively to denote a period of abatement or decline.'

Dr. Preston was now entering into the autumn of the duke's favour.

Fowler.

Autumnal (a-tum'nal), a. 1. Belonging to autumn; produced or gathered in autumn; as, autumnal fruits. — 2. Belonging to a period corresponding to autumn in the year; hence, past the middle stage of life. 'An autumnal matron.' Hawthorne. — Autumnal equinox, the time when the sun crosses the equator as he proceeds southward. This happens about the 23d of September. See EQUINOX. — Autumnal signs, the signs Libra, Scorpio, and Sagittarius, through which the sun passes during the autumn.

Autumnal (a-tum'nal), n. A plant that flowers in autumn.

Autumnity (a-tum-ni-ti), n. The season of autumn. 'Draughts of sweet autumnity.' Bp. Hall. [Rare.]

AVÉRAGE (av'ér-áj), n. [There seem to be two words in English with this form. The present is to be referred to Fr. avarie, It. and Sp. avaria, Sp. averia, D. avarij, G. havarie, havari, haverei, haferi, Dan. ha-veri, damage sustained by goods at sea, avérage in the commercial sense, though its terminal syllable appears to have been borrowed from the other word treated in a succeeding article. Avarie, havarie, &c., have been sometimes derived from the Teut. haver or haf, the sea, but the term seems rather to have originated on the shores of the Mediterranean, and to be derived (as Dozy and Wedgwood think) from Ar. awár, awár, defect, flaw. Skeat thinks, however, that the L. L. acervagium (see AVERAGE below) is sufficient to explain all the meanings, signifying originally the carriage of goods by avéria or draught-cattle, then a charge for carriage, and lastly a contribution towards loss of things carried.] 1. In com. and maritime law, (a) a contribution falling to be made by the owners of a ship's freight and cargo, in proportion to their several interests, to make good a loss that has been sustained or an expense incurred for the general safety of the ship and cargo. Thus, when for the safety of a ship in distress any destruction of property is incurred, either by cutting away the masts, throwing goods overboard, or other means, all persons who have goods on board or property in the ship (or the insurers) contribute to the loss according to their avérage, that is, according to the proportionate value of the goods of each on board. Called also, and more specifically, General Average. (b) A loss or the sum paid on account of a loss (such as that of an anchor) when the general safety is not in question, and which falls on the owner of the particular property lost. Called more specifically Particular Average. (c) A small charge paid by the master on account of the ship and cargo, such as pilotage, towage, &c. Called more specifically Petty Average. (d) A small duty payable by the shippers of goods to the master of the ship, over and above the freight, for his care of the goods. Hence the *ex*pression in bills of lading, 'paying so much freight, with primage and avérage accustomed.'—2. A sum or quantity, intermediate to a number of different sums or quantities; a mean proportion; thus, if four persons lose respectively £2, £5, £10, and £15, the avérage loss by the four is £8.

Hence—3. Any medial amount, estimate, or general statement based on a comparison of a number of diverse specific cases; a medium. 'The avérage of sensations.' Palley.—Upon or on an avérage, taking the mean of several unequal numbers or quantities; taking the mean deduced from a great number of examples.

On an avérage the male and female births are tolerably equal. Buckle.

Aves (á-vér-s), n. pl. [L. birds.] The fourth class of vertebrates, consisting of animals which breathe by lungs, have warm, red blood and a double circulation; are produced from eggs; covered with feathers; have a prominent, naked, toothless bill; and four limbs, the two anterior being organized for flight, and called wings. The bones are hollow, marrowless, and receive air from the lungs. Owing to the extreme compactness and homogeneity of the entire class, conditioned mainly by their aerial mode of life, the subject of their classification has been one of the greatest difficulties of the systematic naturalist. Linnæus and Cuvier divided them into six orders, those of the latter being Palmpedes, Grallæ, Accipitres, Gallinacæ, Passeres, and Scansores. The classification generally adopted is that originally proposed by Kirby, with the addition of Huxley's order Saurures—namely, Natatores or swimmers, Grallatores or waders, *Cursor*es or runners, Rasores or scratchers, Scansores or climbers, Inesores or perchers, Raptores or birds of prey, and the Saurures, including only a single member—namely, the extinct lizard-tailed Archæopteryx. These divisions are founded chiefly on the beak and feet, and the families and genera, into which the several orders are divided, chiefly on the beak. The classification which approaches most nearly a strictly natural one is that of Professor Huxley, who divides the birds into the following three orders:—Saurures, consisting of the single member Archæopteryx; Ratitæ, comprising the running birds that cannot fly, as the ostriches, emus, and cassowaries, whose chief characteristic is that the sternum is raft-shaped, having no median ridge or keel for the attachment of the great pectoral muscles; and Carinatae, comprising all the living flying birds, characterized by the fact that the sternum is furnished with a prominent median ridge or keel.

Avocado, Avigato (a-vi'-ka-dé, a-vi'-ga-tó), n. [Corrupted from Mexican name.] The alligator-pear, the fruit of Persea gratissima, nat. order Lauraceae, a tree common in tropical America and the West Indies. It is from 1 to 2 lb. in weight, is pear-shaped, of a brownish-green or purple colour and is highly esteemed. The pulp is firm and marrow-like, hence the fruit is sometimes known as vegetable marrow or midshipman's butter. The tree is an evergreen, growing to the height of 30 feet.

Avocado or Alligator-pear (Persea gratissima).

Avocat (a-v'-ka-té), n. [Fr.] An advocate, a name given to the higher class of French lawyers.

Avocate (a-v'-ka-té), v. t. [L. avocare, to call away — a, from, and voce, to call. See VOICE and VOCAL.] 1. To call off or away. 'One who avocate his mind from other occupations.' Barrow. — 2. To remove authoritatively from an inferior to a superior court. 'Seeing the cause ascended to Rome.' L. Herbert.

Avocation (a-v'-ka-shon), n. [See AVOCATE.] 1. The act of calling aside or diverting from some object or employment.

God does frequently inject into the soul blessed impulses to duty, and powerful avocations from sin. South.

2. The authoritative removal of a case or process from an inferior to a superior court.

The pope's avocation of the process to Rome, by which his duplicity and absorption from the king's side were made evident, and the disgrace of Wolsey, took place in the summer of 1530. Holmes.

3. The state of being called or wandering aside or away, a straying or wandering.

If not from virtue, from its gravest ways, The soul with pleasing avocation strays. Parnell.

Hence — 4. That which calls a man away from his proper business, a subordinate affair calling a man from his stated occupation; a diversion, a distraction, a hindrance, a disturbing cause.

Vain, business, cards, and I have not how many other avocations do succeed one another so thick, that in the day there is no time left for the distracted person to converse with his own thoughts. Boyle.

My answer to your letter is sufficiently expeditious, but would have been still more so if I had not been interrupted by the business and many other unpleasant avocations. Miss Lister.

5. A man's regular business or occupation; vocation, calling. 'The ancient avocations of picking pockets.' S. Smith. 'The wandering avocation of a shepherd.' Shak.

Does it not require time for an individual, thrust out of one avocation, to gain admittance to another? Carlyle.

[An avocation means the being called away from something. We might say, 'He could not do it, having avocations elsewhere.' But in our newspapers avocation means a man's calling in life. If a shoemaker in his work is struck by lightning and read that 'while pursuing his avocation the electric fluid penetrated the unhappy man's person.' Atford.

This use of avocation for 'vocation,' however common, has seldom had the sanction of good writers. Lord Lytton, in using it, stands pretty nearly alone. I suspect, among very recent writers of any celebrity. On the other hand (the phrase) was long ago used, sometimes to denote 'pursuits,' 'dilettas,' and such like, I think, almost exclusively. Its modern import. Fraser's Hall.

Avocation (a-v'-ka-tiv), n. That which calls aside, a diversion, 'incentives to virtue, and avocations from vice.' Barrow.

Avocative (a-v'-ka-tiv), a. Calling off.

Avocato (a-v'-ka-tó), n. Same as Avocado.

Avocatory (a-v'-ka-to-ri), a. Calling off.

Avocat (a-v'-ka-té), n. Same as Avocat.

To make void, to annul, to make of none effect, to defeat or evade, as a plea brought forward in an action, as, this grant cannot be avoided without injustice to the grantee; (chiefly used in legal phraseology). — 2. To empty. 'Avoid thou thine brethren.' — Barrow. Don — 3. To omit, to reject, to throw out; to void.

A road contains not those untidy parts to avoid that cross the road. St. F. Brown.

4. To quit, to evacuate, to depart from. 'Avoid the gallery.' Shak.

The prince should command him to avoid the country. Barrow.

5. To shun, to keep away from; to eschew, as, to avoid expense, danger, bad company. — 6. To get rid of, to get out or clear of.

I will no longer endure it, though yet I know no other remedy how to avoid it. Shak.

Avoid (a-void'), v. t. 1. To become void, vacant, or empty.

A bench avoids by common law. Atford.

2. To retire, to withdraw. 'Hasten, avoid!' Shak.

David avoided out of his presence. 1 Sam. xviii. 11.

Avoidable (a-void'-a-bil), a. 1. That may be vacated, liable to be annulled. — 2. That may be avoided, left at a distance, shunned, or escaped.

Avoidance (a-void'-ans), n. 1. The act of annulling or making void, annulment.

The obsequious clergy of France pronounced at once the avoidance of the marriage. Madison.

2. The act of vacating, or the state of being vacant, more especially the state of a benefice becoming void by the death, deprivation, or resignation of the incumbent.

Wolsey, on every avoidance of St. Peter's chair, was sitting down thereon, when suddenly some one or other clapped in before him. Farmer.

3. The act of avoiding or shunning. — 4. A retiring from or leaving a place. — 5. An emptying out, that by which a fluid is carried off, an outlet. 'Avoidances and drainings of water.' Barrow.

Avoider (a-void'-er), n. 1. One who avoids, shuns, or escapes. — 2. That which empties.

Avoidless (a-void'-less), a. That cannot be avoided, inevitable. 'Avoidless ruin.' Deane. [Rare.]

Avoidupois (a-void'-du-pois), n. (O Fr. avoir du poids, to have weight, from L. habere, to have, and pensum, something weighed out, from pendere, to hang. See POISE.) A system of weight of which 1 lb. contains 16 oz., in distinction to troy weight, which has only 12. 5760 grains make 1 lb. troy, and 7000 grains troy make 1 lb. avoidupois; hence 178 lbs. troy are equal to 144 lbs. avoidupois. This weight is used for all goods except the precious metals and medicines.

Avoid (a-void'), v. t. [L. avocare, to call away — a, from, and voce, to call.] To call from or back again. By Barrow.

Avoidate (a-void'-at), v. t. [L. avocare, to fly away — a, and voce. See VOLATILE.] To fly away, to escape, to exhale. Boyle.

Avoidation (a-void'-a-shon), n. The act of flying away, flight, escape; exhalation. 'The avoidance of the fustianous particles.' St. T. Brown.

Avocat (a-v'-ka-té), n. (Fr. avocat, it. avvocato.) A peculiar bird of the genus Accipiter.

Avocat (Accipiter striatus).

Avocetra (R. avocetra), family Sceloporidae, order Grallatorina. The bill is long, slender, elastic, and bent upward toward the tip, which distinguishes it from all other birds except a few humming-birds. This bird is of the size of a lapwing, with very long legs, and the feathers variegated with black and white. It is found both in Europe and America.

Avouch (a-vouch'), v. t. [Prefix a, and vouch, Norm. Fr. avoucher, O Fr. avouer, avouer, avouer, &c., from L. ad, to, and vouch, to call (from same stem also voice, voice, voice, voice, &c.) Under the feudal system, when the right of a tenant was impugned, he had to call on (avouch) his lord to defend his right. Hence, to avouch, from meaning to call on to maintain, came itself to signify to maintain or affirm. There has been a certain confusion between this word and avow. See AVOW.] 1. To affirm openly; to declare or assert with positiveness; to acknowledge openly; to avow. 'If this which he avouches do appear.' Shak.

Thou hast avouched this day the Lord to be thy God. . . . And the Lord hath avouched thee to be his peculiar people. Deut. xxvi. 17, 18.

AVOUTERER† AVOUTER†, n. [O. Fr.] An adulterer. Chaucer.

AVOUTERIE†, n. [O. Fr. avouterie, avuterie. See ADULTERY.] Adultery. Chaucer.

AVOW (a-vou'), v. t. [Fr. avouer, O. Fr. avouer, to affirm, to confess or acknowledge—prefix a, from L. ad, to, and Fr. vower, to vow, from L. volare, from L. volum, a vow, from voles, volum, to vow. There has been a certain confusion or commingling of meanings between this verb and avouch.] 1. To declare openly; often to declare openly with a view to justify, maintain, or defend; as, a man avows his principles.

There is not one, I dare avow, But will deserve . . . a right good husband. Shak. Specifically, in law, to acknowledge and justify; as, when the distrainer of goods defends in an action of replevin, and avows the taking, but insists that such taking was legal. See AVOWRY.—2. To confess openly or frankly; to acknowledge; to own.

Left to myself, I must avow, I strove From public shame to screen my secret love. Dryden.

3. To make good; to maintain.

It is my love that keeps mine eyes awake. Shak.

AWAKEMENT (a-wäk'-ment), n. Act of awakening, or state of being awake; revival, especially religious revival.

AWAKEN (a-wäk'-n), v. t. [A. Sax. awacan, awacian, to awake (intrans.). The intransitive meaning of awaken is the older, but the verb is now perhaps more commonly used transitively.] To become awake; to cease to sleep; to be roused from sleep or a state resembling sleep; as, to awaken from sleep. 'A music of preparation, of awakening suspense—a music like the opening of the coronation anthem.' De Quincey.

AWAKEN (a-wäk'-n), v. t. [A. Sax. awacian.] To rouse from sleep or a state resembling sleep; to cause to revive from a state of inaction.

(Satan) his next subordinate Awakening, thus to him in secret spake. Milton. I offered to awaken his regard for's private friends. Shak.

(He) is despatched

Already to awaken whom thou nam'st. Crowper.

AWAKENER (a-wäk'-n-ér), n. He or that which awakens.

AWAKENING (a-wäk'-n-ing), n. 1. Act of awakening from sleep. 'Some minutes are the time of her awakening.' Shak.—2. A revival of religion, or more general attention to religion than usual.

AWAKENING (a-wäk'-n-ing), p. and s. Rousing; alarming; as, an awakening sermon.

AWAKENINGLY (a-wäk'-n-ing-ly), adv. In a manner to awaken.

In other case criticism was required, and criticism was awanting. Sir W. Hamilton.

AWAPET (a-wäp'), v. t. [See AWHAR.]

AWARD (a-wärd'), v. t. [O. Fr. awarder, agarder, to have under ward, to have regard to, to inspect, and hence to pronounce as to the sufficiency of; from a, equivalent to L. ad, to, and the Teutonic stem seen in E. ward, guard, regard, Fr. garder. See WARD.] 1. To adjudge; to give by sentence or judicial determination; to assign by sentence; specifically used to express the act of arbitrators in pronouncing upon the rights of parties; as, the arbitrators awarded damages to A. B.—2. To grant; to allot; to bestow.

The child had many more luxuries and indulgences than had been awarded to his father. Wachter.

AWARD (a-wärd'), v. i. To judge; to determine; to make an award.

AWARD (a-wärd'), n. 1. Judgment; sentence; specifically, the decision of arbitrators on points submitted to them.

We cannot expect an equitable award where the judge is made a party. Glanville.

2. The document conveying such decision; as, all the arbitrators signed the award.

3. An assignment; allotment; bestowal; gift.

AWARDER (a-wärd'-er), n. One that awards or assigns by sentence or judicial determination; a judge.

AWARE (a-wär'), a. [Prefix a, and ware; A. Sax. gawear, wary, cautious; G. gawehr, aware. See WARE.] 1. Apprised; cognizant; in possession of information; as, the general was aware of the enemy's designa.—2. Informed by sight or other sense.

Then Enid was aware of three tall knights On horseback, wholly arm'd, behind a rock, In shadow, waiting. Tennyson.

[Not used attributively.]—SYN. Informed, apprised, cognizant, conscious, acquainted.

AWARN† (a-wärn'), v. t. To warn. 'Every bird and beast awarned made to shroud themselves.' Spenser.

AWASH (a-wosh'), a. or adv. [Prefix a, on, and wash.] Naut. a term used of (a) the position of an anchor when hove up to the surface of the water. (b) The condition of a shoal which the water barely covers: as an adjective, not used attributively.

AWAY (a-wä'), adv. [A. Sax. aweg, onweg, away, absent—a, on, and weg, way. See WAY.] 1. Absent; at a distance; as, the master is away from home.—2. Apart; to a distance; as, to go, run, or come away; to send away; tear away. Often used elliptically; as, whither away so fast? 'Lest Boots and Brewer should have instant occasion to mount (the cab) and away.' Dickens.

Away, old man! give me thy hand; away! Shak.

Love hath wings, and will away. Waller.

From the sense of 'to a distance' comes that of 'out of existence' when used with many transitive verbs, and with intransitive verbs expressing a change of state; as, to drink away, to squander away, to dissipate in drinking or extravagance; to go away; as, the sound goes away; to pass away; to die away. In this sense the word has the effect of converting many intransitive verbs into transitives; as, to idle away; to loiter away; to trifle away, &c.—3. Often the word has merely an intensive force; as, eat away, laugh away, fire away, &c. See To Fire Away under FIRE. 'As if all the chimneys in Great Britain had, by one consent, caught fire, and were blazing away to their dear hearts' content.' Dickens.—AWAY with, (a) used as an imperative phrase, commanding the removal of an object. AWAY with this man and release unto us Barabbas. Luke xlii. 18. (b) Bear; endure; used chiefly in negative phrases. 'She could ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job; VOL. I.

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; YH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KTY.

never away with him.' Shak.—To make away with. See under MAKE.—Far away, (a) at a great distance. (b) By far. [Colloq.] Of all the men whom she had ever seen, he was far away the nicest and best. Trollope.

With awful reverence prone. Milton.

4. Impressed with or exhibiting respect or reverence, as for authority; law-abiding; respectful in the extreme. 'Thrust from the company of awful men.' Shak. 'To pay their awful duty to our presence.' Shak.

5. Having some character in an extreme or noticeable degree; excessive; very great; extraordinary; preposterous; as, an awful fright; an awful dandy; an awful bonnet; to cut an awful figure among other people. [Colloq.]—Awful, Dreadful, Frightful. These adjectives exhibit the same distinctions of meaning as the nouns from which they are derived. Thus awful is full of awe, full of that which inspires awe, or a feeling of deep solemnity and reverence, often with a certain admixture of fear, acting especially upon the imagination; dreadful is applied to what inspires dread, that is, an overpowering fear of coming evil; frightful is more especially applicable to what inspires sudden terror or alarm.—SYN. Solemn, august, venerable, dreadful, fearful, terrible.

Awful (ā'ful), n. A sensational newspaper or other cheap publication; a dreadful.

The beast long struggled as being like to prove An awkward sacrifice. Marlowe.

—Awkward, Clumsey, Uncouth. Awkward, generally applied to oddness or want of ease and grace in the bearing or the use of the arms or legs; clumsey, applied to a peculiarity of the whole body, and conveying the idea of unskillfulness or want of due control; uncouth, lit. unknown, uncommon, out of date; applied to what is out of the usual run of things—to what we are unaccustomed to—often almost synonymous with rude, savage, barbarous, uncivilized, rugged.—SYN. Unhandy, bungling, inept, untoward, clumey, uncouth, ungraceful, ungainly, lubberly, vexatious, troublesome.

Awkwardly (āk'wērd-ly), adv. In an awkward manner; clumsily; in a rude or bungling manner; inelegantly; badly.

Awkwardness (āk'wērd-nes), n. The quality of being awkward; clumsiness; ungracefulness in manners; want of dexterity in the use of the hands or instruments; unsuitableness.

Awl (āl), n. [A.Sax. awul, ael, eal, al, O.E. awel, owel, awl, an awl; Icel. alr, G. ahle; there are also several longer forms, in which is combined another element, as Sc.

elshin, O.H.G. alasna, alanea, an awl.] A pointed instrument for piercing small holes in leather, wood, &c., as the bent-pointed sewing-awl of the shoemaker and saddler and the straight-pointed brad-awl of the joiner.

Awless (ā'les), a. 1. Wanting awe or reverence; void of respectful fear. 'A awless insolence.' Dryden.—2. Wanting the power of inspiring reverence or awe. 'The awless throne.' Shak.

Awl-shaped (ā'phāpt), a. 1. Having the shape of an awl.—2. In bot. slender and tapering towards the extremity from a broadish base, as a leaf; subulate.

Awlwort (ā'wērt), n. The popular name of the Subularia aquatica, so called from its awl-shaped leaves (L. subula, an awl). It is a native of Britain and Ireland.

Awm, Aum (ām), n. Same as Adm.

Awmous (ām'us), n. Alms. [Scotch.]

Awn (ān), n. [Icel. agn, Dan. aghe, Sw. agne, chaff, husk; O.H.G. agana, Goth. alana; from root ak, &c. (See ACID.) Aw, awel contain the same root.] The bristle or beard of corn or grass, or any similar bristle-like appendage.

Awn, Awil (ān, ā'n), ppr. Owing. [Scotch.] Awined (ānd), a. Having awns: a term applied to leaves, leaf-stalks, &c., bearing a long rigid spine, as in barley, Galium aristatum, &c.

Awner (ān'ēr), n. One who or that which removes awns from grain; a hummeller.

Awning (ān'ing), n. [Probably the same word as I.G. hauennig, a shelter, from hauen, Waldwood taken, it from Fr. awent, Med. I. awenna, a pent-house, which Skeat is inclined to derive from an eastern word such as Per. duan, duang, anything suspended.] 1. A covering of canvas or other cloth spread over any place as a protection from the sun's rays.

2. Naut. that part of the poop deck which is continued forward beyond the bulkhead of the cabin.

Awless (ān'les), a. Without awn or beard.

Awmy (ān'ī), a. Having awns.

Awork† (a-wērk), adv. [Prefix a. and work.] At work; in a state of labour or action.

Aroused vengeance sets him new awork. Shak.

Aworking (a-wērk'ing), adv. At work; in or into a state of working or action.

Adventure which might them aworking set. Spenser.

Awroke†, v.t. [A.Sax. awreccan, to avenge, to revenge. See WREAK.] To wreak; to persecute; to take vengeance on; to avenge. Chaucer.

Awrong† (a-rong'), adv. [Prefix a. and wrong.] In a wrong manner. Ford.

Awry (ā-rī'), a. or adv. [Prefix a. and wry.]

1. Turned or twisted toward one side; not in a straight or true direction or position; askant; with oblique vision; as, to glance or look awry; the lady's cap is awry. 'If she steps, looks, or moves awry.' Spectator. 2. Fig. turned aside from the line of truth or right reason; perverse or perversely.

Much of the soul they talk, but all awry. Milton.

Awsome (ā'sum), a. and adv. See AWESOME. [Scotch.]

Ax, Axe (aks), v.t. Old and provincial form of ask.

For I wol ax if it his wille be
To be my wif. Chaucer.

Axal (āk'al), a. Same as Axial. [Rare.]

Axayacatl (āk's-ā-ē-kāt'l), n. A fly common in Mexico, whose eggs, deposited on rushes and flags in large quantities, are sold and used as a sort of caviare called ahuatlil. The dish has been borrowed from the aborigines by the Spanish immigrants.

Axe (aks), n. An axis. Eng. Cyc. [Rare.]

Axe, Ax (aks), n. [A.Sax. ax, eaz, æz, Icel. öx, Dan. æx, D. akse, G. ax, ax; allied to Gr. axine, L. axia, for axia—an axe. From the root ak, ak, a point. See ACTIP.] An instrument, usually of iron, or of iron and steel, for hewing timber and chopping wood. It consists of a head with an arching edge of steel, and a helve or handle. The edge is in the plane of the sweep of the tool, differing therein from the ads. The ancient battle-axe was sometimes two-edged.

Axe-form (aks'fōrm), a. Same as Axe-shaped.

Axe-head (aks'hēd), n. The head or iron of an axe. The ancient axe-heads formed of stone are called by antiquarians celte.

Axe-shaped (aks'shapt), a. In bot. having a resemblance to an axe or hatchet; dolabriform.

Axe-stone (aks'stón), n. A mineral, called also Nephrite or Jade, found chiefly in New Zealand and the South Sea Islands, and used by the natives for axes and other cutting instruments, whence the name. See NEPHRITE, JADE.

Axial (aks'al), a. Pertaining to an axis.—Axial line, the name given by Faraday to the line in which the magnetic force passes from one pole of a horse-shoe magnet to the other.

Axially (aks'al-lí), adv. According to, or in a line with the axis.

Axiferous (aks-ef'ér-us), a. [L. axis, and fero, to bear.] A term applied to those plants which, like lichens, fungi, &c., consist exclusively of an axis, without any leaves or appendages.

Axiform (aks'í-form), a. [L. axis, and forma, shape.] In the form of an axis.

Axill (aks'íl), n. [L. axilla, the armpit.] 1. The armpit; a cavity under the upper part of the arm or shoulder.
2. In bot. the space or angle formed on the upper side between an axis and any organ growing from it, as by a branch with the stem or by a leaf with the stem or branch. Buds usually appear in the axils of leaves.

a a, Axils.

Axile (aks'íl), a. In bot. of or belonging to an axis; lying in the axis, as an embryo which lies in the axis of a seed.

Axilla (aks-íl'la), n. pl. Axillæ (aks-íl'te). Same as Axil.

Axillary (aks-íl-lar), a. Same as Axillary.

Axillary (aks-íl-la-rí), a. Pertaining to the armpit or to the axil of plants.—Axillary artery, in anat. a continuation of the subclavian.—Axillary leaves, in bot. leaves which proceed from the angle formed by the stem and branch.—Axillary vein, in anat. a continuation of the brachial veins and ending in the subclavian vein, and anastomosing with the branches of the axillary artery.

Axinite (aks'ín-ít), n. [Gr. axínē, an axe.] A mineral of the garnet family, which sometimes occurs in lamellar masses, but commonly in crystals, whose general form is that of a very oblique rhomb, or rather four-sided prism, so flattened that some of its edges become thin and sharp like that of an axe, whence its name. It is composed of 45 silica, 25 magnesia, 19 alum, with lime, iron peroxide, manganese, and boric acid. Called also Yanotite and Violet Schorl.

Axinomania (aks-ín-o-man-í), n. [Gr. axínē, an axe, and manía, divination.] An ancient kind of divination for the detection of crime by means of an axe or axes. Thus, an axe might be poised on a bar, and the names of persons suspected repeated; if the hatchet moved at the name of any one he was pronounced guilty.

Axiom (aks'í-om), n. [Gr. axiōma, authority, an authoritative sentence, or that which is assumed, from axios, worthy, axiōs, to think worthy, to esteem.] 1. A self-evident truth or proposition; a necessary truth; a proposition whose truth is so evident at first sight that no process of reasoning or demonstration can make it plainer; as, 'the whole is greater than the part'; 'things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another'; 'it is impossible for a thing both to be and not to be at the same time'; 'from nothing, nothing can arise.' All common notions of the mind, whose evidence is so clear and forcible that a man cannot deny them without renouncing common sense and natural reason, may be called axioms.

Philosophers give the name of axioms only to self-evident truths that are necessary, and are not limited to time and place, but must be true at all times, and in all places.

Reid.

2. An established principle in some art or science; a principle universally received; as, the axioms of political economy.—Axiom, Postulate. Axiom, a self-evident truth, existing in the very nature of things, and hence not admitting of denial. Postulate, something required to be granted as a basis for reasoning. Such a basis may be self-evident and therefore axiomatic, or it may be agreed on between two reasoners and admitted by both, but not as a proposition which it would be impossible to deny.—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw. See under APHORISM.

Axiomatic, Axiomatically (aks'í-ó-mat'ík, aks'í-ó-mat'ík-al), a. 1. Pertaining to axioms; having the character of an axiom; having the nature of self-evident truths or received principles.

Many controversies arise touching the axiomatic character of the law.

Sir W. Hamilton.

In his (the critic's) heart there is no system, no principle, no axiomatic truth that regulates subordinate position.

Johnson.

2. Consisting of axioms.

Axiomatically (aks'í-ó-mat'ík-al-lí), adv. In an axiomatic manner; by the use of axioms.

Axiopisty (aks'í-ó-pis-tí), n. [Gr. axios, worthy, and pistis, faith.] Worthiness to be believed.

Axis (aks'ís), n. pl. Axes (aks'éz). [L. See AXILE.] 1. The straight line, real or imaginary, passing through a body or magnitude, on which it revolves, or may be supposed to revolve, especially such a straight line with regard to which the different parts of a magnitude, or several magnitudes, are symmetrically arranged; as, the axis of the earth or any sphere; the axis of a cone; the axis of a curve; the axis of a system of magnitudes. [In this sense the word is chiefly a term of mathematical and physical science, and the most important applications of it are explained below in the various connections in which it is employed.]—2. In bot. the central line or column about which other parts are arranged; especially the root and stem of the whole plant, being the central part or column around which the other parts are disposed, divided into the ascending axis or stem, and the descending axis or root, which two are united by the collum or neck.—3. In anat. (a) the second vertebra of the neck. It has a tooth-like process which passes upward through the central foramen of the first vertebra or atlas, thus serving as a pivot on which the latter turns; hence, (b) the tooth-like process itself.—Anticlinical axis, in geol. see under ANTICLINAL.—Axis in peritrochio, an old Latin term for the wheel and axle. See under WHEEL.—Axis of a beam of light, the middle ray of the beam.—Axis of a cone, a straight line drawn from the vertex to the centre of the base.—Axis of a curve, a right line dividing it into two symmetrical parts, so that the part on one side exactly corresponds to that on the other, as in a parabola, ellipse, or hyperbola.—Axis of a cylinder, the line drawn from the centre of the one end to that of the other.—Axis of a lens, a straight line drawn through the optical centre of the lens, and perpendicular to both its surfaces.—Axis of a magnet, the imaginary line which connects the north and south poles of the magnet.—Axis of a sphere, any line drawn through the centre and terminated both ways by the surface of the sphere.—Axis of a spherical, concave, or convex mirror, a straight line which passes through the geometrical and optical centres of the mirror.—Axis of a telescope, a straight line passing through the centres of all the glasses in the tube.—Axis of oscillation of a pendulum, a right line passing through the centre, about which it vibrates, and perpendicular to the plane of vibration.—Axis of refraction, the straight line drawn perpendicular to the surface of the refracting medium, through the point of incidence of the refracted ray. Some crystals have two axes of refraction.—Axis of revolution, the axis about which a revolving body moves.—Axis of rotation, the axis about which all the parts of a rotating body turn. The axis of rotation is in the body itself: the axis of revolution is at the centre of the circle or other curve in which the body is moving. These terms are exemplified by the motions of the earth, which rotates on its own axis, and revolves about a line passing through the sun's centre, perpendicularly to the orbit in which it moves.—Axis of symmetry, a line on both or all sides of which the parts of a body or magnitude are symmetrically disposed.—Axis of the earth, the line connecting its two poles, and about which the earth performs its diurnal rotation.—Axis of the eye, a straight line passing through the centres of the pupil and crystalline lens.—Axis of the Ionic capital, a line passing perpendicularly through the middle of the eye of the volute.—Axis of the world, the imaginary axis passing through the celestial poles.—Spiral axis, in arch. the axis of a twisted column spirally drawn in order to trace the circumsolutions without.—Transverse axis, and conjugate axis. See TRANSVERSE and CONJUGATE.—Visual or optic axis, in optics, the straight line passing through the centre of the pupil, and perpendicular to the surface of the eye.

Axis (aks'ís), n. A species of Indian deer, the Cervus axis, of which there are two or three varieties. The body of the common axis is beautifully marked with white spots. Called also Spotted Hog-deer.

Axis-cylinder (aks'ís-a'ín-dér), n. In anat. the name given to the central substance of the primitive nerve-fibre.

Axis, Axle-tree (aks'ís, aks'íl-tré), n. [A. Sax. axel, the shoulder; Icel. axl, the shoulder-joint, axull, an axle; Dan. and Sw. axel, the shoulder, an axle. The word is a diminutive corresponding to O.H.G. ahsala (Mod. G. achsel), the shoulder, from ahsa (Mod. G. achse), an axis. The meaning shoulder is explained by the fact that the arm turns on the shoulder-joint. This meaning has been lost in English probably from the influence of L. axis, O. Fr. aisel (L. articulus), an axis. The L. axis is not the origin of E. axle, but an independent form from the same root, viz. ag, to drive. See ACRE.] A piece of timber or bar of iron, fitted for insertion in the hubs or naves of wheels, on which the wheels turn.—Driving axle, in locomotive engines, the axle which, by means of connecting-rods and eccentric-rods, is connected with the piston, slide-valves, and pumps, and by converting the rectilinear motion of the piston into a rotary one, propels or drives the engine in the required direction.

Axle-arm (aks'íl-arm), n. The spindle on the end of an axle on which the box of the wheel alips, or one of the two pivots on which the axle itself turns.

Axle-bar (aks'íl-bár), n. An axle-tree with an arm at each end for a wheel.

Axle-box (aks'íl-boks), n. The journal-box of an axle, especially of the axle of a railway carriage.

Axle-clip (aks'íl-klíp), n. A clevy or bow which unites some other part of a vehicle to the axle.

Axled (aks'íl'd), a. Furnished with an axle.

Axle-guard (aks'íl-gárd), n. A guard for an axle. See HOUSING, 6.

Axle-nut (aks'íl-nút), n. A screw-nut on the end of an axle-arm to keep the wheel in place.

Axle-pin (aks'íl-pín), n. Same as Line-pin.

Axle-skein (aks'íl-skén), n. A band, strip, or thimble of metal on a wooden axle-arm to prevent the wood from wearing rapidly.

Axle-sleeve (aks'íl-slév), n. A sleeve placed round a railway carriage axle in order to hold up the broken ends should the axle be fractured.

Axle-tree, n. See AXLE.

Axolotl (aks'ó-lót), n. [Mexican name.] A remarkable member of the Urodela or tailed amphibians, the Siredon pisciforme. As usually known it has throughout its life both lungs and gills, but individual specimens kept in confinement have been known to lose the latter. It is somewhat abundant in the Mexican lakes, and 8 or 9 inches long, of a fish-like form, with large head, but swims with its feet, which resemble those of a frog. The axolotl is sold in the markets of Mexico, and is esteemed a great luxury by the inhabitants. Another species (S. ichneoides) also is an inhabitant of Mexico. The genus is also called Axolotes.

Axotomous (aks-ó-o-mus), a. [Gr. axōn, axis, and tómōs, to cleave.] A mineralogical term signifying cleavable in a direction perpendicular to the axis.

Ax-tree (aks'tré), n. Axle-tree. Drayton. [Old English and Scotch.]

Axunge (aks'unj), n. [L. axungia—axis, an axle, and ungō, to grease.] Hog's lard. Ure.

Ay, Aye (í), adv. [An interjectional utterance of assent or surprise. In former sense may be same as aye, ever, or yea, yes; as to latter sense comp. G. ei, ey, expressive of admiration or astonishment; E. eh.] 1. Yea; yea; a word expressing assent or an affirmative answer to a question. It is used also to enforce the sense of what is asserted, equivalent to even so, truly, certainly.—2. Indeed, suggesting anger and reproach, slight surprise, interrogation, or simple attention, indicated by the mode of pronunciation.

AY, Aye (I), n. The word by which assent by acclamation is expressed in Parliament; hence, an affirmative vote. — The ayes have it, the phrase employed by the speaker in declaring that the affirmative votes are in a majority.

Another was the late speaker Trevor, who had, from the chair, put the question, whether he was or was not a rogue, and had been forced to pronounce that the ayes had it. Macaulay.

Ayah (ā'yā), n. In the East Indies, a native waiting woman or lady's-maid.

Ayapana (ā'yā-pā-na), n. The native name of Eupatorium Ayapana, a Brazilian plant, nat. order Compositae, a powerful sudorific, and said to be an antidote to the bite of venomous snakes. The bruised leaves and expressed juice are applied to the wound.

Aye (ā), adv. [Icel. ei, ey, a, aye, ever; A. Sax. ā, duo, always; Goth. -aie in ni-aie, never, aie, time; allied to L. semper, Gr. etern, age, etē, ever. See AGE.] Always; for ever, continually; for an indefinite time, used mostly in poetry.

Let this peracious hour
Stand aye accursed in the calendar! Shak.

Aye-aye (ī-ī), n. (The native name, from its peculiar cry.) A singular nocturnal quadruped, about the size of a hare, found in Madagascar, the Chiromys madagascariensis, in its habits resembling the sloth. Cuvier places it among the rodent animals after the squirrels, although Sonnerat, who discovered it, pointed out its affinity to the from the rhododendrons chiefly by the flowers having ten stamens instead of five. A diminutive, procumbent, evergreen shrub.

Azalea (Azalea Indian).

growing on dry, healthy ground on many of the Highland mountains, was long regarded as the only British specimen, under the name of A. procumbens, but is now called Lonicera procumbens. Many beautiful rhododendrons with deciduous leaves are known under the name of azalea in gardens. The azaleas are principally from North America, but A. pontica is a native of Asia Minor; it possesses poisonous properties, and is said to have produced the Pontic honey which stupefied Xenophon's soldiers on their retreat from Greece. A. indica is a greenhouse plant, held in high esteem for the beauty of its flowers.

Azarois (az'ā-rōi), n. [Fr. azarois.] A species of thorn (genus Craegus), the three-grained or Neapolitan medlar.

Azimuth (az'ī-muth), n. [Ar. as-samt, pl. as-samuth, a way, a path. Zemith has the same origin.] In astron. an arc of the horizon intercepted between the meridian of a place and the vertical circle passing through the centre of a celestial object. The azimuth and altitude of a star give its exact position in the sky. Magnetic azimuth, an arc of the horizon intercepted between the azimuth or vertical circle passing through the centre of any heavenly body and the magnetic meridian. This is found by observing the object with an azimuth compass. Azimuth compass, an instrument for finding either the magnetic azimuth or amplitude of a heavenly object. It differs from the common sea-compass only in this, that the circumference of the card or box is divided into degrees, also to the box is fitted an index with two sights, which are upright pieces of brass placed diametrically opposite to each other, having a slit down the middle of them, through which the sun or a star is to be viewed at the time plied to rocks, as to the metamorphic, in which no fossils have been found.

Azollimine (az'ō-lī'mīn), n. A colouring matter of a deep blood-red colour obtained from litmus.

Azote (az'ōt), n. [Gr. a, priv., and zōē, life.] A name formerly given to nitrogen because it is unfit for respiration.

Azothi (az'ōth), n. [Probably an Ar. word.] In alchemy, (a) the first principle of metals; mercury, which under the name of the mercury of metals was believed to exist in all metals. (b) The universal specific or panacea of Paracelsus.

Azotic (az'ōtīk), a. Pertaining to azote; fatal to animal life. — Azotic acid. Same as Nitric acid. Azotic gas, nitrogen or nitrogen gas.

Azotide (az'ō-tīd), n. An azotized body. See AZOTIZED.

Azotite (az'ō-tīt), n. A salt formed by a combination of nitrous acid with a base. Synonymous with Nitrite.

Azotize (az'ō-tīz), v.t. pret. & pp. azotized; ppr. azotizing. To imbue with nitrogen, to deprive of life.

Azotized (az'ō-tīzd), p. and a. Containing nitrogen or azote. — Azotized bodies (otherwise azotides or nitrides), bodies containing nitrogen, and forming part of the structure of plants and animals, such as albumen, fibrine, caseine, gelatine, &c.

Azotous (az'ō-tūs), a. Nitrous; as, azotous acid = nitrous acid.

Aztec (az'tek), a. Of or pertaining to the Aztecs, the ruling tribe in Mexico at the time of the Spanish invasion under Cortes in 1519. They were a civilized people, but their religious rites were bloody and cruel.

Azure (ā'zhūr), a. [Fr. azur, Sp. azul, It. azzurro, L.L. azurrum, lazarum, &c., from Arab. lazarud, lajward, blue, whence lapis-lazuli, the sapphire. The initial l was lost through being mistaken for the article.] Resembling the clear blue colour of the sky; sky-blue.

Azure (ā'zhūr), n. 1. The fine blue colour of the sky. 'Her eyes a beautiful azure.' Tennyson. — 2. A name common to several sky-coloured or blue pigments, of which there are two well-known varieties: (a) that made of lapis-lazuli, called ultramarine, a colour of great value to the artist; (b) that made by fusing glass with oxide of cobalt reduced to powder: in large masses this latter is called smalt. — 3. The sky or azure vault of heaven. 'Not like those steps on heaven's azure.' Milton. — 4. In her a blue colour in coats of arms, represented in engraving by horizontal lines.

Azure (ā'zhūr), v.t. To colour blue.

Azured (ā'zhūrd), p. and a. Coloured azure; of an azure colour. 'Twixt the green sea and the azured vault.' Shak.

Azure-stone (ā'zhūr-stōn), n. Same as azurite.

Azurine (ā'zhūr-in), a. Azure. Hechtzug.

Azurite (ā'zhūr-it), n. (Cu₂HCO₃)₂. 1. A blue mineral, the lazulite, called also Blue Malachite. It is a tricubic orthocarbonate of copper, and has been used ground to form a fine blue pigment, but is of little use, owing to its turning green by exposure. 2. Same as lazulite.

Azurn (ā'zhūrn), a. Of a blue colour. 'The azurn sheen of turkis blue.' Milton.

Azygous (az'ī-gus), a. [Gr. azygos = a, priv., and zygon, a yoke.] Having no fellow; not one of a pair; single. In anat an epithet applied to several muscles, veins, bones, &c., that are single.

Azym, t. Azymet (az'im), n. [See ASTYMUS.] Unleavened bread.

We have shunned the obscurity of the papists in their azym, tunic, &c.
The Translators of the Bible to the Reader.

Azymite (az'im-it), n. [See ASTYMUS.] Ecclesia, one of a sect of Christians who administer the eucharist with unleavened bread, also a term of reproach applied by the Greeks, in the eleventh century, to the Latins for consecrating the host in unleavened bread.

Azymous (az'im-us), a. [Gr. a, priv., and zymē, leaven.] Unleavened; unfermented; as, azymous is azymous. [Rare.]

Azule-tooth (az'ūl-tōth), n. (Comp. D. azem, to feed to nourish.) A molar tooth. Hall's well; Dunglison.

Aye-aye (Chiromys madagascariensis).

snails or lemons, to which family it is now referred, especially on account of the hand-like structure of its hind-feet.

Ayen, t. adv. Again. Chaucer.

Ayen-bite, t. n. [O.E. for again-bite.] Remorse. The Ayen-bite of Imrei (Remorse of Conscience) is the name of a well-known old English religious production.

Ayenst, t. prep. Against. 'A remedie ayenst lecherie.' Chaucer.

Ayenward, t. adv. Back; backward.

Ayguilet (ā'gu-lēt), n. An aiguillette (which see). Sponser.

Bachelor (bách'el-ér), n. [O.E. bachelor, bachilar, &c., O.Fr. bachelor, bachelier, bachiler, Fr. bachelier: a word whose etymology has been much controverted. The old derivations from baccalarius, as if the word properly meant one crowned with the laurel of Apollo, or from bas chesalier, a low or inferior knight, cannot be maintained. Diez, Littré, and Brachet derive it from Merovingian L. baccalarius, originally the proprietor of a baccalaria or small farm, Brachet taking this word from L.L. bacca, for L. vacca, a cow; comp. Fr. berger, a shepherd, from L. vervex, a wether. The baccalarius was above a serf, but still only a vassal, who marched under the banner of a vassal of higher degree. The word in time came to have the meaning of a person who has obtained a bachelor's degree, and was then corrupted to baccalarius. Wedgwood and others less probably refer the ultimate origin to the Celtic, bringing forward such words as W. bach, Ir. and Gael beg, little, W. baches, a little darling.] 1. Anciently, a person in the first or probationary stage of knighthood who had not yet raised his standard in the field.—2. Badger (Male vulgare) claws on the fore-feet. The common badger, or Mosch vulgaris, is as large as a middle-sized dog, but much lower on the legs, with a flatter and broader body, very thick tough hide, and long coarse hair. It inhabits the north of Europe and Asia, burrows, is indolent and sleepy, feeds by night on vegetables, small quadrupeds &c. and is very fat. Its skin, when dressed with the hair on, is impervious to rain, and consequently makes excellent covers for travelling trunks, &c. Its flesh makes good bacon, and its hair is used for artists' brushes in painting. The American badger (M. latrodromus) is called the ground hog, and is sometimes white. It is a wide spread vulgar error that the legs of the badger are shorter on one side than on the other, hence, 'The western badger' Dragon.

We are not badgers, For our legs are one as long as the other. Lipsy

2. An artist's brush made of badger's hair, and used for blending or causing the pigments to melt or shade into each other and imparting smoothness. Badger bruing, or drawing the badger, a barbarous sport formerly, and yet to some extent, practiced generally as an attraction to public houses of the lowest sort. A badger is put in a barrel, and one or more dogs are put in to drag him out. When this is effected he is returned to his barrel to be similarly assaulted by a fresh lot. The badger usually makes a most determined and savage resistance.

Badger (ba-jér), v. t. To attack, as the badger is attacked when being drawn or baited, to worry, to pester.

Bagpipe (bag'píp), n. A musical wind-instrument of very great antiquity, having been used among the Hebrews and Greeks, and being a favourite instrument over Europe generally in the fifteenth century. It still continues in use among the country people of Poland, Italy, the south of France, and in Scotland and Ireland. Though now often regarded as the national instrument of Old English Bagpiper.

Scotland, especially Celtic Scotland, it is only Scottish by adoption, being introduced into that country from England. The earliest notice of it in Scotland is in the royal treasurer's accounts in the reign of James IV., wherein are frequent entries of monies paid 'to Ingilis pypparis, who came to play before the king, who had brought the taste with him from England. Chaucer's miller could well play the bagpipe, and in Shakespeare's days a 'Yorkshire bagpipe' and the 'drone of a Lincolnshire pipe' were familiar. The bagpipe consists of a leathern bag, which receives the air from the mouth, or from bellows; and of pipes, into which the air is pressed from the bag by the performer's elbow. One pipe (called the chanter) plays the melody, others (called drones) sound respectively the key-note (an octave lower) and the fifth of the scale, the sound being produced by means of reeds. The chanter has eight holes, which the performer stops and opens at pleasure. There are several species of bagpipes, as the soft and melodious Irish bagpipe, the more martial Highland bagpipe, the old English bagpipe (now no longer used), the Italian bagpipe, &c. Bagpipe (bag'píp), v.t. To cause to resemble a bagpipe.—To bagpipe the mizzen (naut.), to lay it aback by bringing the sheet to the mizzen shrouds.

Bail (bâil), v.t. [O. Fr. bailler, to deliver over, as into the custody of another; a liberator, hence, a nurse, and, applied to males, a tutor, a governor. The progressive steps by which L. baifulare became Fr. bailler are thus given by Brachet: baifulare, bajlare, baiiare, bailler.] 1. To deliver; to release.

Ne none there was to rescue her, ne none to bail. Spenser.

2. In law, (a) to set free, deliver, or liberate from arrest and imprisonment, upon security given that the person bailed shall appear and answer in court. The word is applied to the magistrate or the surety. The magistrate bails a man when he liberates him from arrest or imprisonment, upon bail given with sureties. The surety bails a person when he procures his release from arrest by giving bond for his appearance.

When they (the judges) had bailed the twelve bishops, the House of Commons, in great indignation, caused them immediately to be recommitted. Clarendon.

Tu. Let me be their bail. Shak.

(b) To deliver in trust, upon a contract, expressed or implied, that the trust shall be faithfully executed on the part of the bailee or person intrusted; as, to bail cloth to a tailor to be made into a garment, or to bail goods to a carrier.—To bail out, to release a person by acting as his bail.—To bail over to keep the peace, to require surety from a person for his keeping the peace.

Bail (bâil), n. [O. Fr. baül, a guardian; from L. baifulus. See the verb.] 1. The person or persons who procure the release of a prisoner from custody by becoming surety for his appearance in court.

The bail must be real substantial bondsmen. Blackstone.

Bail is not used with a plural termination. 2. The security given for the release of a prisoner from custody; as, the man is out upon bail. In all criminal cases except treason two justices may admit a person to bail, and in all cases of misdemeanour except those enumerated in 11 and 12 Vict. cap. xlii. sec. 23, they are bound to do so; but in cases of treason a person cannot be admitted to bail except by order of a secretary of state, or by the Queen's Bench division of the High Court of Justice, or a judge thereof in vacation. By the law of Scotland an accused person is entitled to be liberated on bail, of a fixed amount according to the rank of the person accused, provided the crime charged against him is not one for which capital punishment may be inflicted, or one for which it might be inflicted before the passing of the act 2 and 3 Will. IV. cxlii. In these cases the Court of Justiciary or the lord-advocate may consent to bail being taken, but they are not bound to do so, and they may fix the amount of bail at their own discretion. In civil cases there are several kinds of bail at common law, the chief being common bail and special bail. Common bail, or bail below, which is now disused, was given to the sheriff on a bail bond entered into by two persons, on condition that the defendant appear at the day and in such place as the arresting process commands. Special bail, bail above, or bail to the action, is given by persons who undertake generally, after appearance of a defendant, that if he be condemned in the action he shall satisfy the debt, costs, and damages, or render himself to the proper person, or that they will do so for him. Wharton. In Scotland bail in civil cases is called caution (which see).—3. Liberation on bail; as, to grant bail.—4. A person who frequents the neighbourhood of law-courts ready to be bail for any one on the payment of a fee. Formerly such persons were straw in their shoes as a sign of their occupation.

The attorney whispered to Mr. Pickwick that he was only a bail. 'A bail!' 'Yes, my dear sir, half-a-dozen of 'em here. Bail you to any amount and only charge half-a-crown.' Dickens.

Where those mysterious personages who were wont in the old times to perambulate the great saloon of the futile footsteps, Westminster Hall, with straws in their shoes, and whose occupation is not by any means gone now-a-days, are always in attendance in a philanthropic eagerness to render service to suffering humanity—or in other words, to become baill where baill is wanted, for a gratuity of half-a-crown to twelve and sixpence. G. A. Sala.

5.† Custody; keeping. 'Silly Faunus, now within their bail.' Spenser.—To admit to bail, or to take bail for, to release upon persons coming forward as bail.—To find bail, to procure persons to act as bail for one.—To go bail, (a) to act as bail or surety. (b) To vouch for (a thing); as, I'll go bail for that.—To hold to bail, to oblige to find bail.—To perfect or justify bail, to prove by the oath of the person that he is worth the sum for which he is surety beyond his debts.—To stand bail, to act as bail or surety.

Bail (bail), n. [It is probable that here we have two words of different origins under one form—the one from O. Fr. baillie, the outer barrier of a fortification (see BAILLET), the other from L. balneum, balneus, a bath or staff.] 1. An advanced post outside the solid defences of a town.—2. A certain limit within a forest.—3. A post; a bar; specifically, a term properly applied to the stumps or wickets at cricket, but now to the little sticks, about 4 inches long, laid on the tops of the stumps, one end resting in the groove of one stump and the other in that of the next. As they fall with the slightest blow, they serve to indicate when the stumps have been struck.

4. A division between the stalls of a stable. 5. The handle of a kettle.—6. One of the hoops supporting the tilt of a boat.

Bail (bail), v.t. [Fr. bailler, It. bagliare, a tub or bucket, perhaps from Armor. bal, a tub; but the word also occurs in the Teutonic languages; D. balie, a bucket, utbalien, to bale out; Dan. balle, ballie, a tub.] To free from water with a bucket or pail; as, to bail a boat. Spelled also Bale.

Bailable (bail'-a-ble), a. 1. Capable of being set free upon bond with sureties; capable of being admitted to bail: used of persons.—2. Admitting of bail; as, a bailable offence.

Bailage (bail'-aj), n. Same as Bailiage (which see).

Bailbond (bail'-bond), n. A bond or obligation given by a prisoner and his surety, to insure the prisoner's appearance in court at the return of the writ.

Bailee (bail'-ee), n. [See BAIL, in law.] In law, the person to whom goods are committed in trust, and who has a temporary possession and a qualified property in them, for the purposes of the trust.

Bailer, Bailor (bail'-er, bail'-or), n. In law, one who delivers goods to another in trust for some particular purpose.

Bailer (bail'-er), n. One who bails or frees from water; anything used to bail out water, especially a small shallow vessel with a handle made for the purpose.

Bailie (bail'-ee), n. [O. Fr. baillie, a palisade, a barrier, from L.L. ballium, a corruption of L. ballum, a rampart, from L. vallus, a stake.] The name given to the courts of a castle formed by the spaces between the circuits of walls or defences which surrounded the keep. The Old Bailey in London got its name thus.

Bailiary, Bailierie (bail'-ee-ri, bail'-ee-ri), n. In Scots law, the extent of a bailie's jurisdiction.—Letter of bailiary, a commission by which an heritable proprietor, entitled to grant such a commission, appoints a baron bailie, with the usual powers, to hold courts, appoint officers under him, &c.

Bailie, Bailie (bail'-ee), n. [See BAILIFF.] A municipal officer or magistrate in Scotland, corresponding to an alderman in England. He possesses a certain jurisdiction by common law as well as by statute. The criminal jurisdiction of the provost and bailies of royal burghs extends to breaches of the peace, drunkenness, adulteration of articles of diet, thefts not of an aggravated character, and other offences of a less serious nature. Formerly a person appointed by precept of sasine to give infettment in land—a legal formality now abolished—was also called a bailie.

Bailiff (bail'-if), n. [O. Fr. baillif, bailli; Sc. baillie; L.L. ballivus, ballivus.] Bailiff, which is the old form, is an adjective taken substantively, and is formed from baillir (same as bailier), to hold, to govern. Littre. See BAIL, to deliver over.] 1. A civil officer or functionary, subordinate to some one else. There are several kinds of bailiffs, whose offices widely differ, but all agree in this, that the keeping or protection of something belongs to them. The sheriff is the monarch's bailiff, and his county is a bailiwick. The name is also applied to the chief magistrates of some towns, to keepers of royal castles, as of Dover, to persons having the conservation of the peace in hundreds and in some special jurisdictions, as Westminster, and to the returning-officers in the same. But the officials commonly designated by this name are the bailiffs of sheriffs, or sheriffs' officers, who execute processes, &c., and bailiffs of liberties, appointed by the lords in their respective jurisdictions to perform similar functions.—2. An overseer or under-steward on an estate, appointed to manage forests, direct husbandry operations, collect rents, &c.: also called a Bailiff of Forests, or Bailiff in Husbandry.—3. An interior officer intrusted with the government of a city or district; a governor.

Lausanne is under the canton of Berne, governed by a bailiff, sent every three years from the senate of Berne. Addison.

—Bailiffs of forests and bailiffs in husbandry. See above, definition 2.—Water bailiffs, officers who protect rivers from poachers and from being fished at illicit seasons.

Bailiwick (bail'-i-wik), n. [O. Fr. bailli, a bailiff, and O.E. wic, a Sax. wic, a village, dwelling, &c.] The precincts in which a bailiff has jurisdiction; the limits of a bailiff's authority, as a hundred, a liberty, a forest, over which a bailiff is appointed.

Bailiage (bail'-i-aj), n. [Fr.] A bailiwick. [Rare.]

At first four bailiages were created. Brougham.

Balister (bal'is-tér), n. [L. ballistarius arcus, a crossbow, from L. ballista, ballista (which see). See also ARBALLIST.] A crossbow.

Balistæ (ba-lis'tæ), n. [From ballista, the military engine, for same reason as they are called trigger-fish.] An extensive genus of plectognathous fishes, family Balistidae, particularly distinguished by the vertical compression of the body, and by having eight teeth arranged in a single row in each jaw. They are known as trigger-fish, because the large and sharp first ray of the dorsal fin cannot be pressed down until the second ray is depressed, when the first shuts down like the hammer of a gun on the trigger being pulled.

Balistidæ (ba-lis'ti-dæ), n. pl. [Balistes (which see) and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] The file-fishes, a family of brilliantly coloured tropical fishes, of the order Plectognathi, characterized by a conical compressed body, jaws armed with one or two rows of distinct teeth, the upper jaw being immovably united with the skull, and by the skin being covered with scaly plates surmounted by spines and tubercles. They feed on molluscs and polyps, especially upon the young of the madreporæ, and frequent coral-reefs, the asperities of which their armed skin enables them to resist. The Monacanthus (Aleuteres) Monoceros, or unicorn file-fish, can distend its abdomen at pleasure. It grows to the length of more than 2 feet. One species, Balistes capricus, is found in the Mediterranean. Their flesh is unwholesome or poisonous.

Balistraria (ba-lis-trä'ri-a), n. [L., from balista, a cross-bow.] In old fort. (a) a cruciform aperture in the walls of a fortress, through which crossbowmen discharged their arrows. (b) The room wherein the ballisters or cross-bows were deposited. (c) A turret in which an archer was stationed projecting from the parapet or from the face of the building. These turrets are common in the border counties of England and Scotland, and are commonly called bartizans.

Balise (ba-léz'), n. [Fr. balise, Sp. valiza, a beacon; L. palus, a stake.] A sea-mark; a pole raised on a bank.

Balk (bak), n. [A. Sax. balca, a balk or ridge between furrows, a beam, a roof, a covering; Sc. bauk, a ridge left in ploughing, or serving as a boundary, a beam in a roof; Icel. bálkr, a balk, a partition; balki, Sw. Dan. bjælke, G. balken, a beam. From the senses of a dividing ridge or a beam there is no very violent transition to that of a check or frustration.] 1. A ridge of land left unploughed in the body of a field, or between fields; an uncultivated strip of land serving as a boundary, often between pieces of ground held by different tenants. [Common in provincial English and Scotch.]

Dikeres and deliveres digged up the balkes.

Piers Plowman.

2. Anything left untouched, like a ridge in ploughing. [Rare.]

The mad steale about doth fiercely fly,
Not sparing wight, ne leaving any balke. Spenser.

3. A beam or piece of timber of considerable length and thickness; specifically, (a) a cross-beam in the roof of a house which unites and supports the rafters; a tie-beam. 'Tubbes hanging in the balkes.' Chaucer. [Provincial English and Scotch.] (b) Milit. one of the beams connecting the successive supports of a trestle-bridge or bateau-bridge. (c) In carp. a squared timber long or short; a large timber in a frame, floor, or the like; a square log.—4. A frustration; a check; a disappointment. 'A balk to the confidence of the bold undertaker.' South. [Written also Bauk.]

Balk (balk), v. t. [See above.] 1. To leave untouched in ploughing. Gower. Hence.—2. To leave untouched generally; to omit; to pass over; to neglect; to shun.

Not doth he any creature balk,
But lays on all he meets. Drayton.

Sick he is, . . . and balks his meat. Rp. Hall.
By reason of the contagion in London, we balked the inns. Boslyn.

3. To disappoint; to frustrate.

Charles was not to be balked in his generous purpose. Prescott.

4.† To heap up so as to form a balk or ridge. [Rare.]

Ten thousand bold Scots, three and twenty knights, Balk'd in their own blood, did Sir Walter see On Holmedon's plains. Shak.

[Some editors read balk'd in this passage.]

Balk (bak), v. i. 1. To turn aside or stop in one's course; as, the horse balked; he balked in his speech. Spenser. [Obsolete in this country, but still used in America.] 2.† To deal at cross purposes; to talk beside one's meaning.

Her list in stryfful terms with him to balk. Spenser.

Balkier (bak'ér), n. One who balks.

Balkier (bak'ér), n. A fisherman's name for one who stands on rocks and eminences to spy the shoals of herring, and to give notice to the men in boats which way they pass.

Balkingly (bak'ing-ly), adv. In a manner to balk or frustrate. Clarke.

Balkish (bak'ish), a. Furrowy; ridged; uneven. 'That craggy and balkish way.' Holmeshead.

Balky (bak'i), a. Apt to turn aside or to stop abruptly; as, a balky horse. [American.]

Ball (bal), n. [From Fr. balle, which is from O. H. G. balla, palla, G. ball, Icel. bóllr, ball; hence also It. balla, Sp. bola, a ball. Bale, a package, is another form, and balloon, ballot are derivatives.] 1. A round body; a spherical substance, whether natural or artificial; or, a body nearly round; as, a ball for play; a ball of thread; a ball of snow.—2. Any part of a thing, especially of the human body, that is rounded or protuberant, as the ball of the eye; the ball of the thumb; the ball of a dumb-bell; the ball of a pendulum, that is, the weight at the bottom.—3. The globe or earth, from its figure. [Now rare.]

Julius and Anthony, those lords of all,
Low at her feet present the conquered ball.
Granville.
Freedom and arts together fall. Pope.

A globe representing the earth is a common symbol of sovereignty; hence Bacon has the phrase to hold the ball of a kingdom in the sense of to bear sovereignty over it.—4. A game played with a ball.—5. In farriery, a form of medicine, corresponding to the term bolus in pharmacy. It is generally in the form of a cylinder 2 or 3 inches in length.—6. In metal, a loop (which see).—7. Milit. the projectile of a firearm; a bullet; such projectiles having formerly been always spherical. In this sense the word is also used collectively; as, to supply a regiment with powder and ball.—8. In printing, a cushion consisting of hair or wool, covered with leather or skin, and fastened to a stock, called a ball-stock, formerly used to put ink on the types in the forms.—9. In pyrotechnics, a composition of combustible ingredients, which serve to burn, smoke, or give light.—Ball-and-socket, an instrument made of brass, with a universal screw, to move horizontally, obliquely, or vertically, used in managing surveying and astronomical instruments.—Ball-and-socket joint, a joint formed by a ball or rounded end of anything playing within a socket, so as to admit of motion in all directions. This kind of joint is much employed for gasaliers, and is exemplified in the hip-joint of man.

Ball (bál), n. [Armor. bal, a white mark on an animal's face. See BALD.] A common name for a cart-horse in England.

Ball (bál), n. [Corn. bal, Ir. boll, a hole, a mine.] A tin mine.

Ball (bál), n. [Fr. bal, It. ballo, Sp. baile, a dance; It. and L. L. ballare, to dance, to shake, from Gr. ballizeo, to dance. Ballad, ballad are from this stem.] A social assembly of persons of both sexes for the purpose of dancing, either at the invitation and expense of an individual, or at the cost of those attending it, in which case the ball is said to be public.

Ball (bál), v. t. To make into a ball; specifically, (a) in the manufacture of cotton, to wind into balls. (b) In metal, to heat in a furnace so as to form balls for rolling.—Balling machine, a machine for balling cotton thread.—Balling furnace, a furnace for balling piles or faggots of iron.—Balling tool, a tool for this purpose.

Ball (bál), v. i. To form or gather into a ball, as snow on horses' hoofs, or mud on the feet. We can say either that a horse balls, or that the snow balls.—Balling iron, in farriery, a hook for clearing horses' feet from balls of snow, &c.

Ballad (bal'lad), n. [Fr. ballade, a ballad, Pr. ballada, from L. L. and It. ballare, to dance. See BALL, a dance, also BALLAT, BALLLET.] 1. A short narrative poem, especially such as is adapted for singing; a poem partaking of the nature both of the epic and the lyric. As applied to the minstrelsy of the borders of England and Scotland, of Scandinavia and Spain, a sort of minor epic reciting in verse, more or less rude, the exploits of warriors, the adventures of lovers, and the mysteries of fairyland, designed to be rehearsed in musical recitative accompanied by the harp. 'Roundel, ballades, and virelay.' Gower.

A ballad, properly speaking, is a simple narrative of one or more events, set to a tune sufficiently rhythmical to act as one of the original purposes of a ballad, namely, a dance tune. The old ballad tunes still existing are nearly all of this character.

Stainer & Barrett.

The Scottish ballads are in general superior to the English, and it is highly probable that they derive many of their literary as well as their dialect peculiarities from the songs of the Scandinavian bards, whose popular ballads are generally of a higher rank than those of the English or of any other of the Northern nations. The Scottish resemble the Scandinavian ballads both in form and in diction, and some Northern words and forms occur in them, of which it would not be easy to produce examples in other branches of literature. G. P. Marsh.

2. In music, a short air, repeated to two or more stanzas, simple in construction, and having an accompaniment of a strictly subordinate character.

Ballad (bal'lad), v. t. To make or sing ballads.

Ballad (bal'lad), v. t. To celebrate in a ballad. 'Rhymers ballad us out o' tune.' Shak.

Ballader, Balladist (bal'lad-ér, bal'lad-ist), n. A writer or singer of ballads.

Balladize (bal'lad-iz), v. t. To convert into the form of a ballad; as, to balladize a story. [Rare.]

Ballad-maker (bal'lad-mák-ér), n. A writer of ballads. Shak.

Ballad-monger (bal'lad-mung-ér), n. A dealer in ballads; an inferior poet; a poet-aster.

I had rather be a kitten and cry mew,
Than one of these same metre ballad-mongers. Shak.

Ballad-opera (bal'lad-op'e-ra), n. An opera in which only ballads are sung. Johnson.

Balladry (bal'lad-ri), n. Compositions of the ballad kind; the style of ballada. 'Base balladry is so beloved.' Drayton.

Ballad-singer (bal'lad-sing-ér), n. A person whose employment is to sing ballads in the streets.

Ballahou (bal'a-hó), n. A fast-sailing two-masted vessel, rigged with high fore-and-aft sails, much used in the West Indies. The foremast rakes forward, the mainmast aft.

Ballam (bal'am), n. A canoe hollowed out of timber, in which Ceylonese pearl-fishers wash out the pearls from the oysters.

Ballant (bal'ant), n. A ballad. [Scotch.]

They're dying to rhyme over prayers, and ballants, and charms. Sir W. Scott.

Ballan-wrasse (bal'an-ras), n. [Lit. spotted-wrasse; Ir. bal, ball, a spot, Gael. ballach, spotted.] An acanthopterygian fish, Labrus bergylla or maculatus, family Labridæ, taken all over the British coasts. Its flesh is not much esteemed. The young are known as the streaked wrasse.

Ballarag (bal'la-rag), v. t. [A form of bully-rag (which see).] To bully; to threaten. [Vulgar.]

You vainly thought to ballarag us. T. Warton.

Ballas, † Ballace (bal'las), v. t. To ballast. Webster. See BALLAST, pp.

Ballast (bal'last), n. [D. ballast, Dan. ballast, baglast, ballast; lit. a back load—bag, back, after, and last, load, cargo—either as a load in the after part of the ship, where ballast was stowed, or as a back or return load after a cargo had been carried away and discharged. Or, according to another etymology proposed, bal = E. bale, and ballast is therefore literally a load useless or of no value (in itself).] 1. Heavy matter, as stone, sand, or iron, laid on the bottom of a ship or other vessel, to sink it in the water to such a depth as to enable it to carry sufficient sail without upsetting. A ship is said to be in ballast when she sails without a cargo, having on board, besides ballast, only the stores and other articles requisite for the use of the vessel and of the passengers on board.—2. The sand placed in bags in the car of a balloon to steady it, and to enable the aeronaut to lighten the balloon by throwing part of it out.—3. The material used to fill up the space between the rails on a railway in order to make it firm and solid.—4. Fig. that which confers steadiness.

These men have not ballast enough of humility and fear. Hammond.

Ballast (bal'last), v. t. 1. To place ballast in or on; as, to ballast a ship; to ballast a balloon; to ballast the bed of a railway. See the noun.—2. Fig. to confer steadiness on; to keep steady. 'Th' charity must ballast the heart.' Hammond.—3. Fig. to counterbalance by anything solid whatever has a tendency to inflate or render unsteady.

Now you have given me virtue for my guide,
And with true honour ballasted my pride. Dryden.

Ballast (bal'ist), pp. Ballasted. 'Who send whole armadas of caravans to be ballasted.' Shak.

Ballastage (bal'ist-aj), n. 1. An old right of the admiralty in all the royal rivers of Britain of levying a rate for supplying ships with ballast. 2. The toll or duty paid for taking ballast from a port or harbour.

Ballast-engine (bal'ist-en-jin), n. A steam-engine used for dredging a river or drawing earth and ballast on a railway.

Ballast-getter (bal'ist-get-er), n. One who is employed in procuring ballast for ships.

I now come to the nature of the ballast labour itself. This is divisible into three classes that performed by the ballast-getters, or those who are engaged in raising it from the bed of the Thames, by the ballast-ferriers, or those who are engaged in carrying it from the quays to the ships requiring it, and by the ballast-haulers, or those who are engaged in putting it on board of such ships. Mayhew

Ballast-hauler (bal'ist-hav-er), n. 1. One who is employed in putting ballast on board ships. See extract under BALLAST-GETTER. 2. A dredging machine for raising ballast from a river bed, a ballast-lighter.

Ballasting (bal'ist-ing), n. 1. The act of furnishing with ballast as a ship or railway. 2. Ballast, that which is used for ballast, as gravel or broken stones, shingle, or other material, used for the covering of roads or to form the upper works or permanent way of a railway.

Ballast-lighter (bal'ist-lit-er), n. 1. One who is employed in conveying ballast for ships. See extract under BALLAST-GETTER. 2. A large flat-bottomed barge for heaving up and carrying ballast, or for removing sand, silt, or other depósitos from the beds of rivers and the bottoms of harbours, docks, &c.

Ballast (bal'ist), n. [A form of ballast, following the it spelling ballast.] A ballast.

Ballast (bal'ist), n. To sing or celebrate in a ballad.

I make but repetition
Of what is ordinary and by rote
And ballad, and would he play'd it the stage.
Sh. Lear.

Ballastoon (bal'is-tun), n. A heavy luggage boat employed in Russia in the transport of timber, especially from Astrakhan to Moscow.

Ballastry (bal'ist-ri), n. [Form equivalent to ballastry, from ballast and form of ballast.] Stock of ballast, ballast-dumping. Mayhew

Ball-calibre (bal'kal-i-bér), n. A ring-gauge for determining the diameter of gun-shot on board ship.

Ball-cartridge (bal'kar-trif), n. A cartridge containing a ball, in contradistinction to blank cartridge.

Ball-caster (bal'kast-er), n. A caster for furnaces, having a ball instead of a roller.

Ball-cock (bal'kok), n. A kind of self-acting stop-cock opened and shut by means of a hollow sphere or ball of metal attached to a. Valve shown open in its usual position. b. Arm of the lever, which being raised moves the valve.

Fig. 1. Cock with ball-cock attached.
Fig. 2. Internal structure of Cock.

the end of a lever connected with the cock. Such cocks are often employed to regulate the supply of water to cisterns. The ball floats on the water in the cistern by its buoyancy, and rises and sinks as the water rises and sinks, shutting off the water in the one case and letting it on in the other.

Ballad, a. Ballad deprived of ball. Chaucer

Ballier (bal'ér), n. One who makes up new thread into balls for domestic use.

Ballist (bal'ist), n. [Fr. ballist, it. ballista. See BALL, a cannon.] 1. A cannon, more or less elaborate, in which several persons take part. 2. A complete pantomime or theatrical representation, in which a story is told, and actions, characters, and passions represented by gesture, accompanied by characteristic or illustrative music, dancing, scenery, decorations, &c. 3. In Art a bearing in coats of arms, denominated according to the colour, bar, pale, pike, &c.

Ballist (bal'ist or bal'ist), n. To express by dancing or in a ballad.

No answer to her. 'Will you come down here and dance?' Shakespeare

Ball-flower (bal'flu-er), n. In arch. an ornament resembling a ball placed in a circular flower, the three petals of which form a cup round it. This ornament is usually found inserted in a hollow moulding and is generally characteristic of the decorated style of the fourteenth century.

Ball-gudgeon (bal'gud-jon), n. A spherical gudgeon, permitting a lateral deflection of the arbor or shaft, while still remaining itself in the socket. E. H. Knight

Ballings, Ballage (bal'li-aj, bal'li-aj), n. [Fr. ballage, the jurisdiction of a bailli. See BALLIFF.] A small duty formerly paid to the city of London by aliens, and even by denizens, for certain commodities exported by them.

Balliards (bal'yards), n. pl. Billiards.

Ballimong (bal'li-mong), n. A dredge.

Ballist-gun (bal'ist-gun), n. An instrument for administering medicine rolled into balls to horses. It consists of a tube from which the air is partially exhausted, the ball being held on the end of the tube by the pressure of air and released thence by a piston when fairly within the atmosphere. E. H. Knight

Ballistrum (bal'istrum), n. [Or ballista, to trip or caper.] A form of pelay, attended with the leap or running.

Ballista, Ballista (bal'is-ta, bal'is-ta), n. pl. Ballistae, Ballistae (bal'is-tae, bal'is-tae). [L. from Gr. ballis, to throw.] 1. One of the two great military engines used by the ancients for discharging missiles, especially against a besieged place, and often confounded with the catapult used for throwing darts, while the ballista threw stones. In principle it resembled the medieval archer or cross-bow, but was much stronger, ballistae being mentioned that threw stones of 4 cwt. They were worked by machinery, as by lever and axle. The cord was of hair. After the time of Julius Caesar the term appears to have been applied in a loose way to any large engine for throwing missiles. 2. In anat. the extragalus, a bone of the tarsus.

Ballistae (bal'is-tae), n. Same as Ballistae.

Ballistic (bal'is-tik), a. [From L. ballista. See BALLISTA.] Pertaining to the ballista or to the art of shooting stones or missiles by means of an engine. — Ballistic pendulum, an apparatus invented by Benjamin Robins for ascertaining the velocity of military projectiles, and consequently the force of fired gunpowder. A piece of ordnance is fired against a cast-iron case filled with bags of sand, which forms the ball of a pendulum, and the percussion causes the pendulum to vibrate. The arc through which it vibrates is measured on a copper arc by an index carrying a vernier, and the amount of vibration forms a measure of the force or velocity of the ball. The ballistic pendulum is now nearly superseded by Navier's electro-ballistic apparatus. See ELECTRO-BALLISTIC, EXHIBITION.

Ballistics (bal'is-tiks), n. The science or art of discharging large missiles by the use of the ballista or other engine.

Ballium (bal'li-um), n. [See BALLEY.] In arch. a court within a fortified castle. There were commonly two balliums, an outer and inner.

Ballon (bal'lon), n. [Fr.] In show, same as balloon.

Balloon (bal'lon), n. [O Fr. balon, a large ball, a foot-ball, arg. of ball, a ball, Mod Fr. ballon, a foot-ball, a balloon, an arg. of ball, a ball, Sp. balon, a foot-ball and the game. See BALL.] 1. A large ball of leather inflated; the game played with it, a kind of football.

The master spent three hours in the balloon. Mayhew

2. In show, a round vessel with a short neck to receive whatever is distilled, a glass receiver of a spherical form. 3. In arch. a ball or globe on the top of a pillar. 4. In pyrotechnics, a ball of pasteboard or kind of bomb stuffed with combustibles, which, bursting like a bomb, exhibits sparks of fire like stars. 5. In weaving, a cylindrical reel on which sized woollen yarn for warp is wound in order to be dried by rapid revolution in a heated chamber. E. H. Knight — 6. A bag or hollow vessel filled with hydrogen gas or heated air, or any other gaseous fluid lighter than common air, the contained gas causing it to rise and float in the atmosphere. It is made of silk or other light material, varnished with causticous dissolved in turpentine. A network of twine envelops the balloon, and is tied to a circular hoop a little below the body of the balloon, from which a car, usually consisting of a large wicker basket and bearing the aeronaut or others, is suspended. A valve in the bottom of the balloon can be opened or closed at pleasure by means of a string, and the basket is furnished with hand-ropes as ballast. If the aeronaut wishes to ascend he throws out some of the ballast, if to descend he opens the valve. Balloons have been successfully used for military purposes (see Captive Balloon, below), and, in the case of besieged cities, as a medium of communication with the outside world (see Steering Balloon, below). The greatest height yet attained in a balloon was 7 miles by Messrs. Glaisher and Coxwell in 1862. — Captive balloon, a balloon attached to some particular place by means of a rope, which may be either permanently fixed or connected with an anchor which can be raised at pleasure. Such balloons are employed for military reconnaissance, or for dropping missiles, as nitro glycerine bombs, upon forts or any other place to be assailed. — Steering balloon, a balloon capable of being steered. One such was invented by M. Dupuy de Lôme during the siege of Paris in 1871. The rudder is said to be able to deflect the machine 11° to either side of the direct line in which the wind is blowing, so that a balloon leaving Paris with the wind straight for Brussels could be landed either at London or Cologne.

Balloon (bal'lon), n. A state barge of France, made of a single piece of timber, very long, and managed with oars.

Ballooned (bal'loned), a. Swelled out like a balloon.

Balloon-fish (bal'lon-fish), n. A curious tropical, malacopterygian or soft-spined fish, of the order Plectognathi, the Tetraodon lineatus or striped spine-belly. Like the didodon, it has the power of distending itself by swallowing air and making it pass into cavities beneath the skin, and of causing its organs to erect themselves. Both jaws are divided in the middle, giving the fish the appearance of possessing four teeth, two above and two below.

Ballooning (bal'lon-ing), n. The art or practice of managing balloons.

Ballooningist (bal'lon-ing-ist), n. One who makes or ascends in a balloon, an aeronaut.

Balloon-net (bal'lon-net), n. A kind of woven lace in which the web threads are twisted in a peculiar manner round the warp. E. H. Knight

Balloomy (bal'lon-ee), n. The art or practice of ascending in a balloon. Quart. Rev.

Ballot (bal'lot), n. [Fr. ballotte, a little ball used in voting, dim. of ball, a ball. See BALL.] 1. A ball used in voting. — 2. A appearance of possessing four teeth, two above and two below.

Ballooning (bal'lon-ing), n. The art or practice of managing balloons.

Ballooningist (bal'lon-ing-ist), n. One who makes or ascends in a balloon, an aeronaut.

Balloon-net (bal'lon-net), n. A kind of woven lace in which the web threads are twisted in a peculiar manner round the warp. E. H. Knight

Balloomy (bal'lon-ee), n. The art or practice of ascending in a balloon. Quart. Rev.

Ballot (bal'lot), n. [Fr. ballotte, a little ball used in voting, dim. of ball, a ball. See BALL.] 1. A ball used in voting. — 2. A appearance of possessing four teeth, two above and two below.

Ballooning (bal'lon-ing), n. The art or practice of managing balloons.

Ballooningist (bal'lon-ing-ist), n. One who makes or ascends in a balloon, an aeronaut.

Balloon-net (bal'lon-net), n. A kind of woven lace in which the web threads are twisted in a peculiar manner round the warp. E. H. Knight

Balloomy (bal'lon-ee), n. The art or practice of ascending in a balloon. Quart. Rev.

Ballot (bal'lot), n. [Fr. ballotte, a little ball used in voting, dim. of ball, a ball. See BALL.] 1. A ball used in voting. — 2. A appearance of possessing four teeth, two above and two below.

Ballooning (bal'lon-ing), n. The art or practice of managing balloons.

Ballooningist (bal'lon-ing-ist), n. One who makes or ascends in a balloon, an aeronaut.

Balloon-net (bal'lon-net), n. A kind of woven lace in which the web threads are twisted in a peculiar manner round the warp. E. H. Knight

Balloomy (bal'lon-ee), n. The art or practice of ascending in a balloon. Quart. Rev.

Ballot (bal'lot), n. [Fr. ballotte, a little ball used in voting, dim. of ball, a ball. See BALL.] 1. A ball used in voting. — 2. A ticket or paper, or the like, by which one votes, and containing no indication of who the voter is. — 3. The system of voting in such a way that the voters cannot be identified, the act of voting by balls or tickets. 'The insufficiency of the ballot.' Dictionary. Vote by ballot is the mode adopted in this country in the election of members of Parliament, members of school-boards, and of municipal corporations, the ballot having been introduced by an act passed in 1872. In such statutory elections the mode of voting is by voting papers, and not by balls. In clubs, scientific societies, insurance offices, commercial associations, etc., the members, managers, or directors are almost universally elected by ballot, and for this purpose coloured balls are usually employed, hence the expression to black-ball, signifying to reject a candidate. — 4. The whole amount of votes given, as, there was a large ballot.

Ballot (bal'lot), v. i. [Fr. balloter. See the noun.] To vote or decide by ballot, frequently with for; as, he was proposed as a member of the club, and ballotted for accordingly. See the noun.

The judges . . . would never take their balls to ballot against him. North.

Ballot (bal'lot), v. t. To vote regarding by ballot; to vote for or against by ballot; to choose or elect by ballot.

None of the competitors arriving at a sufficient number of balls, they fell to ballot some others. Sir H. Wilson.

Ballots (bal'lot), n. [Gr. ballotē, a plant believed to be black horsehound.] A genus of hairy or woolly plants, nat. order Labiata. One species, B. nigra (the black or stinking horsehound), has been used in pectoral complaints and in cattle diseases.

Ballotant (bal'lot-ant), n. A voter by ballot. Jas. Harrington. [Rare.]

Ballotation (bal'lot-a-shon), n. A voting by ballot. [Rare.]

The election of the Duke of Venice in one of the most intricate and curious forms in the world, consisting of ten several ballotations. Sir H. Wilson.

Balm — 1. Anything which heals, soothes, or mitigates pain. 'Sleep . . . the balm of hurt minds.' Shak. — 2. The name of several plants, particularly of the genus Melissa, nat. order Labiata. The balm-mint or garden balm is M. officinalis (See MELISSA.) The species are aromatic and used as corroborants. — Balm of Gilead, the exudation of a tree, Balsamodendron gileadense, nat. order Amyridaceae, a native of Arabia Felix, and also, it is said, from the closely allied species Balsamodendron Opobalsamum. The leaves of the former tree yield when bruised a strong aromatic scent, and the balm of Gilead of the shops, or balsam of Mecca or of Syria, is obtained from it by making an incision in its trunk. It has a yellowish or greenish colour, a warm bitterish aromatic taste, and an acidulous fragrant smell. It is valued as an odoriferous unguent and cosmetic by the Turks, who possess the country of its growth. It is frequently adulterated for market. — Balm of Gilead for, which produces a turpentine called Canada balsam, is the Abies balsamea. It rises to the height of 20 feet, and its range is from Virginia to Canada. — Bayard's balm is a plant of the genus Melittia.

Balsam (bal'sam), n. [Gr. balsamon, L. balsamum, a fragrant gum, said to be from Heb. basal, prince, and shamen, oil.] 1. An oily, aromatic, resinous substance, flowing spontaneously or by incision from certain plants. A great variety of substances pass under this name. But in chemistry the term is confined to such vegetable juices as are liquid or spontaneously become concrete, and consist of resins mixed with gums or volatile oils, the resins being produced from the oils by oxidation. A balsam is thus intermediate between a volatile oil and a resin. It is soluble in alcohol and ether, and capable of yielding benzoic acid. The balsams are either liquid or solid of the former are the balm of Gilead, and the balsams of copaiba, Peru, and Tolu, of the latter, benzoin, dragon's blood, and storax. — Balsam of Mecca, balm of Gilead. See BALM. — Balsam of Peru, the produce of Myrsopernum peruvianum. The last two balsams, in addition to their medicinal use, are employed in perfumery, in the manufacture of pastilles, and of chocolate. Balsam of Tolu, the produce of Myrsopernum toluiferum, nat. order Leguminosae, the tolu-tree of South America. It is of a reddish yellow colour, transparent, thick, and tenacious, but growing hard and brittle by age. It is very fragrant, and, like the balsam of Peru, is a stimulant, and used as a pectoral. — Balsam or Canada balsam of the microscopists, the liquid resin of Abies balsamea, employed for preserving dry transparent objects when mounted for the microscope. 2. The Impatiens balsamina, a beautiful ornament of our gardens and greenhouses. See IMPATIENS. — Balsam apple (Momordica Balsamina), an annual Indian plant. A water and a subtle oil are obtained from it, which are used as deobstruents. — Balsam tree, a name given to several balsam-producing trees, as Cistus, Copallera (which produces the balsam of copaiba), and Pistacia, the turpentine-tree or mastich-tree, and, specifically, to the Abies balsamea, the tree which produces Canada balsam.

Bambusa (bam-bu'sa), n. [See BAMBOO.] A genus of grasses containing nearly seventy species, natives of tropical regions, many of which attain a great size. The best known is B. arundinacea. From the creeping underground rhizome, which is long, thick, and jointed, spring several round jointed stalks, which at 18 or 12 feet from the ground send out from their joints several shoots which are united at their base. The stalks are armed at their joints with one or two sharp rigid spines. The oblong oval leaves, 8 or 9 inches long, are placed on short footstalks. The flowers grow in large panicles from the joints of the stalk. Some stems grow to 8 or 6 inches in diameter, and are so hard and durable as to be used for building and for all sorts of furniture, for water pipes, and for poles to support palanquins. The smaller stalks are used for walking-sticks, flutes, &c. The plant is used for many purposes in the East Indies, China, and other eastern countries. Cottages are almost wholly made of it, also, bridges, boxes, baskets, mats, paper, masts for boats, &c. It grows for twenty-five or more years before it produces seed, which is sometimes used as rice, while the young shoots are made into pickles. The pith is innoxious. There are several other well-known and useful species, as B. spinosa, common about the plantain is M. paradisiaca. It is an herbaceous plant with an underground stem. The apparent stem, which is sometimes as high as 30 feet, is formed of the closely compacted sheaths of the leaves. The leaves are 2 feet long and 1 foot broad, with a strong midrib, from which the veins are given off at right angles, they are used for thatch, basket-making, &c., besides yielding a fiber from which some of the finest muslins of India are prepared. The spikes of the flowers grow nearly 4 feet long in bunches, covered with purple-coloured bracts. The fruit is 4 or 5 inches long, and 1 inch or more in diameter. It grows in large bunches, weighing often from 40 to 80 lbs. The pulp is soft and of a luscious taste, when ripe it is eaten raw or fried in oil. The banana is cultivated in tropical and sub-tropical countries, and is so important article of food. Weight for weight it is inferior in nutriment to the potato, but it is more productive than any other plant grown for food, and a much greater number of persons can be subsisted in a given space of ground with the banana than in an equal space of Europe with wheat.

1. Bambusa (B. arundinacea), showing its mode of growth. 2. Flowers, leaves, and stem on a larger scale.

Calcutta, forming stockades penetrable only by artillery; B. indica, used for scaffolding and covering native houses; B. tabacaria, whose joints are used for the stems of tobacco-pipes; B. picta, for light walking-sticks. B. baluosa, for building. The finest species is perhaps B. latifolia, a native of Orinoco. Like other grasses, the bamboo contains silica in considerable quantity, the stalks of some species, as B. tabacaria, striking fire with a hatchet.

Bambusa (bam-bu'sa), n. pl. A tribe of grasses of great economical importance, comprising nearly 300 species, divided into several genera, of which the genus Bambusa may be regarded as the type. (See BAMBOO.) Besides the species there described the tribe includes Dendrocalamus strictus, used in India for the shafts of lances; Microstoma bambusoides, which produces a fleshy edible fruit of the size and form of a large pear; and several others of economical value.

Of the three judges on each bench, the first may be a Presbyterian, the second a free-will Baptist, the third a Churchman.

Baptistery (bap'tis-tér-î), n. A building or a portion of a building in which is administered the rite of baptism. In the early Christian Church the baptistery was distinct from the basilica or church, but was situated near its west end, and was generally circular or octagonal in form, and dome-roofed. About the end of the sixth century the baptistery began to be absorbed into the church, the font being placed within and not far from the western door. Some detached baptisteries still remain in use, as those of St. John Lateran, Rome, at Pisa, Parma, Ravenna, Florence, &c. As a separate building the baptistery was often of considerable size and highly decorated, that of Florence being 108 feet in diameter externally. It is octagonal in shape, internally surrounded by a row of columns with rich capitals, bearing architraves carrying a second range of smaller columns, the wall spaces between which are perforated by windows. The free wall-spaces are ornamented with figures of saints; the dome being covered with representations of sacred subjects in mosaic. Baptisteries were dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

Senegal.] The Adansonia digitata of botanists, belonging to the group Bombacaceæ, called also the Ethiopian sour-gourd or African calabash-tree. It is one of the largest trees in the world, being often found 30 feet in diameter, though it rises only from 40 to 70 feet high. The branches shoot out 60 to 70 feet, bearing a dense mass of deciduous leaves, somewhat similar to those of the horse-chestnut. The oblong pulpy fruit is eaten by monkeys, and hence is called monkey-bread (which see). The juice of the fruit mixed with sugar is much esteemed as a beverage; and the pulp, which is pleasantly acid, is eaten, and employed as a remedy in Egyptian dysentery. The leaves and bark, dried and powdered, are used by the negroes, under the name of lala, as pepper on their food, to diminish the excessive perspiration; and the strong fibre of the bark is made into ropes and cloth. The only other species of this genus known is the Australian sour-gourd or cream-of-tartar tree (A. Orygonia).

Barbarian (bār-bā'ri-an), n. [L. barbarus; Gr. barbaros, applied originally to one whose language is unintelligible. Probably onomatopoeitic to express the sound of a foreign tongue.

By the word barbarian originally it is probable that no sort of reproach was intended, but simply the fact that the people so called spoke a language not intelligible to Greeks. Latterly the term seems to have been often used as one of mere convenience for classification, indicating the non-Hellenes in opposition to the Hellenes; and it was not meant to express any qualities whatever of the aliens—simply they were described as being aliens. . . . At this day it is very probable that the Chinese mean nothing more by the seemingly offensive term outsider barbarians. De Quincey.]

1.† A foreigner. [This is the uniform sense of the word in the New Testament.]—2. A man in his rude savage state; an uncivilized person.

Where his rude hut by the Danube lay;

Barm (bārm), n. [A. Sax. beorma, bearma, Fris. berne, barm, Sw. bärma, Dan. bärme, L. G. borma, barme, barm, G. bärme, barm, yeast, perhaps from the verb to bear, as G. hefe, barm, from heben, to heave, and Fr. levain, leaven, from lever, to lift, or more probably from root of brew.] Yeast; the scum or foam rising upon beer, or other malt liquors, when fermenting, and used as leaven in bread to make it swell, causing it to be softer, lighter, and more delicate. It may be used in liquors to make them ferment or work. It is really a fungus, Torula Cerevisia. See YEAST, FERMENTATION.

Barm (bārm), n. Same as Berm (which see). Barmald (bārm-ald), n. A maid or woman who attends the bar of an inn or other place of refreshment.

Bar-master (bār'mas-tēr), n. [G. berg-meister, a surveyor of mines; comp. barmote.] A comptroller of mines.

Barm, t. n. [A. Sax. bearm, barm, O. Sax. Dan. and Sw. barm, Goth. barme, the bosom; loel. barmr, the lap of a garment, a brim, and later the bosom; from root of verb to bear.] The bosom; the lap.

Barmecide, Barmecide (bār'me-sid, bār'ma-sid), a. [From Barmecide, the name of a powerful Persian family. See story of the barber's sixth brother in the Arabian Nights, to whom Barmecide pretended to give a sumptuous feast, which Schachabac professed to eat and enjoy, although there were no viands brought forward at all.] A term applied to what is tantalizing and unsatisfying; mock; sham; without substance. 'A Barmecide feast.' Thackeray.

Barme-cloth, t. n. [See BARME.] An apron. Chaucer.

Barmilian (bār-mil'yan), n. An old name for a kind of fustian goods largely exported from England.

Barmkyn, Barmkin (bārm'kin), n. [From berm (which see).] The rampart, or outer fortification of a castle.

And broad and bloody rose the sun,
And on the barmkyn shone. Old ballad.
Battlements and barmkyns and all the other appurtenances of a Strength, as such places were called. Lever.

Barmote, Barghmote (bār'mōt, bārg'mōt), n. [A. Sax. berg, a hill, and mote, an assembly.] The name of two courts having jurisdiction over those parts of the hundred of High Peak in Derbyshire which belong to the duchy of Lancaster, and are therefore crown possessions, the crown having here the right to the mineral duties. The great barmote is held twice a year for swearing in the grand-jury, &c.; the little barmote is held as occasion may require for the trial of actions. Both are presided over by a judge called the steward.

Barmy (bārm'ī), a. Containing harm or yeast. 'Of windy cider and of barmy beer.' Dryden.

Barn (bārn), n. [A. Sax. berenn—bers, barley, and arn, or ern, a house, a repository; comp. A. Sax. horsenn, a stable; slapern, a sleeping place.] A covered building for securing grain, hay, flax, or other farm produce: in America it may be for stabling horses or cattle.

Barn, t. n. A child. See BAIRN.

Mercy on's, a barn; a very pretty barnet! A boy or a child, I wonder? Shak.

Barnabee (bār'na-bē), n. The lady-bird. [Provincial.] Barnabite (bār'na-bit), a. Of or belonging to the order of St. Barnabas; as, a Barnabite monk; a Barnabite friar.

Barnaby (bār'na-bī), n. An old dance to a quick movement.

Bounce! cries the porthole—out they fly,
And make the world dance Barnaby. Cotton.

Barnacle (bār'na-kl), n. [Fr. bernacle, bernacle, L. L. bernacula, for pernacula, dim. of L. perna, a ham, and also from its shape a kind of shell-fish, a limpet. This is the origin according to Max Müller, who derives the word in the meaning of goose from Hibernia, Ireland, supposing that the barnacle geese were originally called hiberniculus, or Irish geese, and that the similarity in the names gave rise to the extraordinary belief regarding the origin of these birds. (See below.) As the name of a kind of shell-fish, however, the word may be from the Celtic rather than the Latin; comp. Fr. branaiche, brénache, barnache, Gael. bairneach, barnacles, limpets; W. brenig, limpets; Manx barnagh, a limpet.] 1. A stalked cirriped, genus Lepas, family Lepadidae, often found on the bottoms of ships, on pieces of timber floating in or fixed below the surface of the sea; the goose-mussel. The name has also been loosely applied to other cirripeds, as the species of the closely allied genus Balanus. See LEPADIDÆ.—2. A species of goose (Anser Bernicula), found in the northern seas, but visiting more southern climates in winter. The forehead and cheeks are white, the upper part of the body and neck is black. Formerly a strange notion prevailed that these birds grew out of the barnacles attached to pieces of timber fixed or floating in the sea, and believed also to grow on trees overhanging the sea. This belief may have arisen from some fancied resemblance of the cirripeds of the same name to birds; somewhat in the same way as the plant columbine has received its name. The barnacle goose is rather smaller than the common wild goose; it weighs about 5 lbs., and is rather more than 2 feet long. Written also Bernacle.

Barnacle (Lepas anatifera).

This belief may have arisen from some fancied resemblance of the cirripeds of the same name to birds; somewhat in the same way as the plant columbine has received its name. The barnacle goose is rather smaller than the common wild goose; it weighs about 5 lbs., and is rather more than 2 feet long. Written also Bernacle.

Barnacles (bār'na-klz), n. pl. [Probably a corruption of binoculi. See BINOCLE.] 1. An instrument consisting of two branches joined at one end with a hinge, to put upon a horse's nose, to confine him for shoeing, bleeding, or dressing: in this sense formerly used in the singular.—2. A cant name for a pair of spectacles.

Barn-door (bār'n-dōr), n. The door of a barn.—Barn-door fowl, a name given to the common domestic fowl.

Barn-owl (bār'n-oul), n. The common white or church owl (Strix flammea), so called from being often found in barns, where it proves very useful by destroying mice. See OWL.

Barns-breaking (bār'ns-brāk-ing), n. Any mischievous or injurious action; an idle frolic. [Scotch.]

There is blood on your hand, and your clothes are torn. What barns-breaking have you been at? You have been drunk, Richard, and fighting. Sir W. Scott.

Barn-yard (bār'n-yārd), n. A yard adjacent to a barn.—Barn-yard fowl, one of our common domestic fowls.

Barograph (bār'ō-graf), n. [Gr. baros, weight, and graphō, to write.] A self-registering instrument for recording the variations in the pressure of the atmosphere. It is made by attaching to the lever of a counterpoised barometer an arm with a pencil in contact with a sheet of paper, and moved uniformly by clock-work. The result is a continuous trace, whose form corresponds to the variations of pressure.

Baroko, Barocco (bā-rō'kō), n. [A mnemonic word.] In logic, a syllogistic mood in the second figure, of which the first proposition is a universal affirmative, and the other two are particular negatives.

Barolite (bār'ō-lit), n. [Gr. baros, weight, and lithos, a stone.] Carbonate of baryta. See WITHERITE.

Barology (bār'ō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. baros, weight, and logos, discourse.] The science of weight or of the gravity of bodies.

Baromacrometer (bā-rom'a-krom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. baros, weight, makros, long, and metron, measure.] An instrument invented by Professor Stein for determining the weight and the length of new-born infants.

Barometer (bā-rom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. baros, weight, and metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the weight or pressure of the atmosphere. The simplest instrument of this kind consists of a glass tube, about 33 inches long, hermetically sealed at one end, and then filled up with pure mercury, after which it is placed perpendicularly with the open end dipping into a cup or cistern containing pure mercury. On the tube being inverted the column of mercury sinks a little, leaving a vacuum at the top till the pressure of the atmosphere on the surface of the mercury in the cup equals the weight of the column in the tube and supports it. When the atmosphere is denser its pressure is greater and the mercury is forced higher, whereas when it is rarer and consequently lighter, the mercury falls, thus indicating by its risings and fallings the varying pressure of the air. The mean height of the barometer at sea-level is 30 inches. This instrument was invented by Torricelli, of Florence, in 1643. A water-barometer might be constructed exactly in the same manner, only in this case the column would be about 34 feet in height, water being so much lighter than mercury. The most common applications of the barometer are to indicate changes of weather and to determine the altitude of mountains, by the falling and rising of the mercury (the mercury falling the higher the barometer is carried, and consequently the less the pressure of the air). In order to show the exact extent of these variations the tube is connected with a graduated scale, so that small movements in the column are observable. There are several varieties of the barometer, of which the two kinds most in use as a weather-glass are the common upright barometer and the wheel barometer. The upright barometer (described above in its simplest form) is, when properly constructed, the most accurate of all barometers. The wheel barometer belongs to the class of Siphon Barometer.

Wheel Barometer.

siphon barometers, one of which is shown in the adjoining cut. The siphon barometer consists of a bent tube, generally of uniform bore, having two unequal legs. The longer leg, which must be more than 30 inches long, is closed, while the shorter leg is open. A sufficient quantity of mercury having been introduced to fill the longer leg, the instrument is set upright, and the mercury takes such a position that the difference of the levels in the two legs represents the pressure of the atmosphere. In the best siphon barometers there are two scales, one for each leg, the divisions on one being reckoned upwards, and on the other downwards from an intermediate zero point, so that the sum of the two readings is the difference of levels of the mercury in the two branches. The wheel barometer is far from being accurate, but it is often preferred for ordinary use on account of the greater range of its scale, by which small differences in the height of the column of mercury are more easily observed. It usually consists of a siphon barometer, having a float resting on the surface of the mercury in the open branch, a thread attached to the float passing over a pulley, and having a weight as a counterpoise to the float at its extremity. As the mercury rises and falls the thread turns the pulley which moves the index of the dial. A rack and pinion may be substituted for the thread as in the cut. The marine barometer is suspended in gimbals, and is usually constructed at the bottom to prevent rapid oscillations of the mercury. The mountain barometer is a portable mercurial barometer with a tripod support and a long scale for measuring the altitude of mountains. To prevent breakage, through the oscillations of such a heavy liquid as mercury, it is usually carried inverted, or it is furnished with a movable basin and a screw, by means of which the mercury may be forced up to the top of the column.—Aneroid Barometer. See under ANEROID. Barometer-gauge, an apparatus attached to the boiler of a steam-engine or other chamber in which a more or less perfect vacuum is liable to be formed, to indicate the state of the vacuum. A common form is a bent tube with one end plunged in a basin of mercury, and the other end connected with the vacuum chamber.

Barometric, Barometrical (bar-ô-met'rik, bar-ô-met'rik-al), a. Pertaining or relating to the barometer; made by a barometer; as, barometric changes; barometrical experiments; barometrical measurements.

Barometrically (bar-ô-met'rik-al-li), adv. By means of a barometer.

Barometrograph (bar-ô-met'rô-graf), n. [Gr. baros, weight, metron, measure, and graphô, to write.] An instrument contrived for inscribing of itself upon paper the variations of atmospheric pressure.

Barometrography (ba-rom'et-rog'ra-fi), n. [See BAROMETROGRAPH.] The science of the barometer; also, the art of making barometric observations.

Baromets (bar-ô-mets), n. The decumbent caudex of the fern Cibotium barometz, also called the Agnus Scythicus, the Scythian or Tartarian lamb. See AGNUS SCYTHICUS.

Baron (bar'on), n. [Fr. baron, O.Fr. ber, bers (baron in the acc.). Pr. bar (baron in acc.). It. barone, Sp. varon. The origin of the word is doubtful. Its earliest meanings are such as strong man, bold man, warrior, husband, nobleman, and the derivation from O.H.G. bar, a man, from beran, Goth. bairan, E. to bear, seems as probable as any, whether the notion originally attaching to the word was that of one who could bear, as being strong and robust, or one who was born, a human being; comp. A. Sax. beorn, a prince, which appears certainly to be from beran, to bear, to produce. These German etymologies Littré remarks, without being completely certain, are probable, though it is probable also that the Celt. (O.Cym.) bar, a hero, and perhaps (Gael.) feair, a man, have united in confirming and giving precision to the sense of the Germanic word in the Romance languages.] 1. In Great Britain, a title or degree of nobility; one who holds the lowest rank in the peerage; as, Baron (or Lord) Auckland; Baron Arundell of Wardour. The children of barons have the title of 'Honourable.' Originally the barons, being the feudatories of princes, were the proprietors of land held by honourable service. Hence in ancient records the word barons comprehends all the nobility. All such in England had in early times a right to sit in parliament. Anciently barons were greater, or such as held their lands of the king in capite; or lesser, such as held their lands of the greater barons by military service in capite. The present barons are—(1) By Prescription; for that they and their ancestors have immemorially sat in the Upper House. (2) Barons by patent, having obtained a patent of this dignity to them and their heirs male, or otherwise. (3) Barons by tenure, holding the title as annexed to land. Wharton. Formerly, when all barons were not summoned to sit in parliament, the name of barons by writ was given to those who actually were so. The word baron was not known in the British Isles till introduced from the Continent under the Norman princes. The coronet of a baron of England consists of a plain gold circle, with six balls or large pearls on its edge, cap, &c., as in a viscount's.—2. A title of certain judges or officers; as, barons of the exchequer, who are the judges that try cases between the king and his subjects relating to the revenue; barons of the Cinque Ports, members of the House of Commons, formerly elected by the five (afterwards seven) Cinque Ports, two for each port. These ports are Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, Hythe, Winchelsea, and Rye.—3. In law, a husband; as, baron and femme, husband and wife.—Baron of beef, in cookery, two sirloins not cut asunder.

Baronage (bar'on-aj), n. 1. The whole body of barons or peers.

In England, under the Normans, the church and the baronage were convoked, together with the estate of the community, a term which then probably described the inferior holders of land, whose tenure was not immediate of the crown. Diraceli.

2. The dignity of a baron.—3. The land which gives title to a baron.

Baron-court (bar'on-kört), n. See COURT-BARON.

Baroness (bar'on-es), n. A baron's wife or lady.

Coronet of a Baron.

Baronet (bar'on-et), n. [Dim. of baron.] 1. † A lesser or inferior baron: in this usage the word had not the specific sense that it received in the time of James I.

Dukes, earls, barons, and baronets might use livery of our lord the king, or his collar. Stat. temp. Hen. IV.

2. One who possesses a hereditary rank or degree of honour next below a baron, and therefore not a member of the peerage; one entitled to the designation of Sir So-and-so, Bart. (Christian name and surname being given), and having precedence before all knights except those of the Garter. At investiture there is no ceremony, the title being given by patent. The order was founded by James I. in 1611, with the professed object of promoting the colonization of Ulster with Scotch and English immigrants, each baronet being bound to maintain thirty soldiers for three years. The number originally created was 200.—Baronets of Scotland and Nova Scotia, an order of baronets founded by Charles I., with the professed object of colonizing Nova Scotia. Along with the title grants of land in Nova Scotia were given, to be held of Sir William Alexander, Earl of Stirling, then governor of that colony. There have been no additions to this order since the union of England and Scotland, but in every other respect the remaining baronets of Nova Scotia are on an equality with other baronets.

Baronetage (bar'on-et-aj), n. 1. The baronets as a body.—2. The dignity of a baronet.

Baronetcy (bar'on-et-si), n. The title and dignity of a baronet; as, a baronetcy was conferred upon him in recognition of his distinguished services.

Baronial (ba-rô-ni-al), a. Pertaining to a baron or a barony. 'Baronial possessions.' Lord Lytton.

Barony (bar'on-i), n. 1. The title or honour of a baron; also the territory or lordship of a baron.—2. The body of barons and other peers. Wharton.—3. In Ireland, a territorial division, corresponding nearly to the English hundred, and supposed to have been originally the district of a native chief. There are 262 baronies in Ireland.

Whatever the regular troops spared was devoured by bands of marauders who overran almost every barony in the island. Macaulay.

Baroque (bâ-rôk'), n. [Fr.] In the fine arts, a name given to ornamental designs of a florid and incongruous character, indicative of a taste for display rather than for true and appropriate decoration. Fairholt.

Baroscope (bar'ô-skôp), n. [Gr. baros, weight, and skôpos, to view.] An instrument to show the weight of the atmosphere, superseded by the barometer.

Baroscopic, Baroscopical (bar'ô-skôp'ik, bar'ô-skôp'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or determined by the baroscope.

Baroselenite (bar'ô-sel'en-it), n. [Gr. baros, weight, or barus, heavy, and E. selenite (which see).] A mineral, sulphate of baryta, or heavy-spar. See BARYTES.

Baroams (ba-rô-ma), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Rutaceæ. The leaves of B. crenata constitute the article of matéria medica called ducks, which is used in various chronic affections of the bladder. The leaves have a heavy powerful odour and an aromatic taste, and are stimulant, antispasmodic, and diuretic. The species are small evergreen shrubs, with dotted leathery leaves, and small white or red flowers in their axils. They are all natives of the Cape of Good Hope. The Hottentots perfume themselves with the leaves, which have a smell like rue. Sometimes called Baryama.

Barouche (ba-rôsh'), n. [From G. barutche, which is from It. baroccio, biroccio, L.L. barrotium, a kind of carriage, from L. birotus, two-wheeled—bis, double, and rota, a wheel. Barouche is not a French word, though its appearance might lead one to think so.] A four-wheeled carriage with a falling top, with seats, as in a coach.

Barouchet (bâ-rô-shâ'), n. [Dim. of barouche.] A small kind of barouche, or a four-wheeled open carriage with a head.

Bar-post (bâr-pôst), n. One of the posts driven into the ground to form the sides of a field gate.

Bar-pump (bâr-pump), n. Same as Bar-pump.

Barquantine (bârk'an-tîn), n. [From barque, on type of brigantine.] A name applied on the great lakes of North America to a three-masted vessel square-rigged in the foremast and fore-and-aft rigged in the main and mizzen masts. Barquinates differ from three-masted schooners in having a regular brigantine's foremast, and are long in proportion to their other dimensions to suit the canals connecting some of these lakes. Spelled also Barquentine.

Barque (bark), n. [Fr. barque, Sp. Pg. It. and L.L. barca, a barque, perhaps through a dim. form barica, from Gr. baria, a skiff, though Littré derives it from the Celtic; Gael. barc, Armor. barc, a boat, a skiff. The D. bark, G. bark, are probably borrowed from the French. See BAROK.] 1. Naut. a three-masted vessel with only fore-and-aft sails on the mizzen-mast, the other two masts being square-rigged. 2. A sailing vessel of any kind, especially one of small size. 'An armed barque.' Goldsmith.

Barra-boat (bar'-a-bōt), n. [Island of Barra.] A vessel of the Western Isles of Scotland, carrying ten or twelve men, extremely sharp fore and aft, having no floor, but with sides rising straight from the keel, so that a cross section would represent the letter V. These vessels are swift and safe, being light and buoyant.

Barra-can (bar'-kan), n. [It. baracane, Sp. barraquin, from Ar. barrakān, said by Sousa to be from Per. barak, a stuff made of camel's hair.] A thick strong stuff made in Persia and Armenia of camel's hair. The name has also been applied to fabrics made of other materials, as wool, flax, and cotton. Called also Barraquin.

Barrack (bar'-ak), n. [Fr. baraque, It. baracca, Sp. baraca, a soldier's hut, from L.L. barra, a bar; comp. Gael. barrack, branches of trees; O. Gael. and Ir. barrackad, a hut or house, which are from same root.] 1. A hut or house for soldiers, especially in garrison; the permanent buildings in which both officers and men are lodged in fortified towns or other places.

He (Bishop Hall) lived to see his cathedral converted into a barrack and his palace into an alehouse.

2. A large building, or a collection of huts or cabins, especially within a common inclosure, in which large numbers of men are lodged.

Most of the quartermen are Bretons, and live in wooden baracks.

[In both senses generally in the plural.] Barrack-master (bar'-ak-mas'-ter), n. The officer who superintends the barracks of soldiers. — Barrack-master general, an officer who superintends the construction and repairs of barracks, and adapts the accommodation to the requirements.

Barraciade (bar'-a-kiād), n. [D. baar, bare, and kleed, cloth.] A home-made woollen blanket without nap. [New York.]

Barracoön (bar'-a-kōn'), n. [From Sp. Pg. barraça, a soldier's hut. See BARRACK.] A negro-barrack; a slave depot; a bazaar where men of the African races are sold. Barracoons used to exist at various points of the west coast of Africa, also in Cuba, Brazil, &c. African barracoons were composed of large but low-roofed wooden sheds, in which the human article was stored. Some had defensive works, to resist the attacks of the British forces engaged in the slave-trade preventive service.

Barracuda (bar'-a-kū'da), n. [Native name.] A species of percid fish (Sphyrana Barracuda), averaging 10 feet in length, found in the seas about the Bahamas and West Indies. The colour is deep brown, and the fish is very voracious. The flesh is disagreeable, and sometimes poisonous.

Barrad, Barrad (bar'-rad, bar'-rād), n. [Celtic form of barret. See BIRETTA.] A conical cap of very ancient origin, worn by the Irish down till as late as the seventeenth century.

Barrage (bā'-rizh), n. [Fr.] In engin, an artificial obstruction placed in a water-course in order to obtain increased depth for navigation, irrigation, or other purposes; a dam; an embankment.

Barragon (bar'-a-gon'), n. Same as Barra-can.

Formerly in the dead months they availed themselves greatly by spinning wool for making barragons, a genteel corded stuff much in vogue at that time for summer wear. Gilbert White.

Barranca (bā'-ran'-ka), n. The Spanish name for a deep gully or ravine with vertical sides, such as are made by heavy rains or floods: commonly used in America.

Barras (bā'-ras), n. [Fr.] The resin obtained from Pinus maritima; galipot.

Barrator (bar'-a-tor), n. [O.Fr. barateur, a cheater, barat, barate, deceit. See BAR-TER.] 1. One who frequently excites suits at law; a common mover and maintainer of suits and controversies; an encourager of litigation.

Will it not reflect as much on thy character, Nic, to turn barrator in thy old days, a stirrer up of quarrels amongst thy neighbours. Arcturion.

2. The master or one of the crew of a ship who commits any fraud in the management of the ship or cargo, by which the owner, freighters, or insurers are injured. See BARRATRY. 2.—3. In Scots law, a judge who takes a bribe.—4. In old Scots law, a clergyman who went abroad to purchase a benefice from the see of Rome. Written also Barretor.

Barratrous (bar'-a-trus), a. Characterized by or tainted with barratry.

Barratrouly (bar'-a-trus-ly), adv. In a barratrous manner.

Barratry (bar'-a-tri), n. [See BARRATOR.] 1. In law, the practice of exciting and encouraging lawsuits and quarrels.

'Tis arrant barratry that base, Point-blank an action 'gainst our laws. Hudibras.

2. In com. any species of cheating or fraud in a shipmaster or mariner, by which the owners, freighters, or insurers are injured; as, by running away with the ship, sinking or deserting her, by wilful deviation, or by embezzling the cargo.—3. In Scots law, the crime of a judge who is induced by a bribe to pronounce a judgment.—4. In old Scots eccles. law, the offence of exporting money out of Scotland to purchase benefices at Rome. Written also Barretry.

Barrel (bar'-el), n. [O.Fr. barrel, Fr. baril, from Celt.: W. baril, Gael. barail, a barrel. The root is seen in W. bar, the branch of a tree, a bar. (See BAR.) Comp. Fr. barrique, a wooden vessel made of bars or staves.] 1. A wooden vessel of more length than breadth, round and bulging in the middle, made of staves and heading, and bound with hoops; a cask.—2. The quantity which a barrel contains.—3. Anything hollow and long; a tube; a cylinder; as, the barrel of a gun.—4. The cylindrical case in a watch, within which the mainspring is coiled, and round which is wound the chain.—5. The cylinder studded with pins which in the barrel-organ opens the key-valves, and in the musical box sets in vibration the teeth of the steel comb by which the sound is produced.—6. The trunk of a quadruped as contradistinguished from the extremities: generally applied to the trunk of a horse. 'A close ribbed-up barrel.' O. W. Holmes.—Barrel of the ear, in anat. a cavity of the ear, 4 or 5 lines deep and 5 or 6 wide, situated within the membrane of the tympanum, by which it is separated from the external passage or meatus. More commonly called the Cavity of the Tympanum.—Barrel of a boiler, the cylindrical part of a boiler containing the fires.

Barrel (bar'-el), v.t. pret. & pp. barrelled; ppr. barrelling. To put in a barrel; as, to barrel beef, pork, or fish.

Barrel-bellied (bar'-el-bel'-id), a. [See BELLY.] Having a round and protuberant or barrel-shaped belly.

Barrel-bulk (bar'-el-bulk), n. Naut. a measure of capacity for freight, equal to 5 cubic feet. Eight barrel-bulk, or 40 cubic feet, equal 1 ton measurement.

Barrel-curb (bar'-el-kurb), n. An open cylinder, 3 feet 6 inches or 4 feet in length, formed of strips of wood nailed round horizontal ribs of elm, used as a mould in well-sinking to keep the well cylindrical.

Barrel-filler (bar'-el-flī-er), n. An apparatus for filling barrels provided with an automatic arrangement, generally in the nature of a float, for cutting off the supply of liquid in time to prevent overflow.

Barrelled (bar'-eld), a. Having a barrel: used generally in composition; as, a double-barrelled gun.

Barrel-loom (bar'-el-lōm), n. A Jacquard loom. See JACQUARD.

Barrel-organ (bar'-el-or-gan), n. An organ in which a wooden cylinder or barrel furnished with pegs or staples, when turned round, opens a series of valves to admit a current of air to a set of pipes, producing a tune either in melody or harmony. In another form of the instrument wires like those of the piano are acted on instead of pipes. Barrel-organs are generally portable, and mostly used by street-musicians.

Barrel-pen (bar'-el-pen), n. A pen with a split cylindrical shank adapting it to slip upon a round holder.

Barrel-screw (bar'-el-akrō), n. A powerful apparatus consisting of two large poppets, or male screws, moved by levers inserted into their heads upon a bank of plank, with a female screw at each end; of great use in starting a launch. Called also Bed-screw.

Barren (bar'-en), a. [O.E. barrein, barain, barraigne, &c.; from O.Fr. barraigne, brahaine, brahaigne, sterile, possibly from Armor. breckan, sterile. Dix refers the O.Fr. to bar, a man (see BARON), and cites as illustrative and confirmatory Sp. machorra, a barren woman, from macho, a male.] 1. Incapable of producing its kind; not prolific: applied to animals and vegetables. 'The barren fig-tree.' Hooker.

There shall not be male or female barren among you. Deut. vii. 14.

2. Unproductive; unfruitful; sterile. 'Barren mountain tracks.' Macaulay.—3. Fig. not producing or leading to anything; unsuggestive; unconstructive; as, a barren treatise.

Some schemes will appear barren of hints and matter, but prove to be fruitful. Swift.

4.† Not affected; dull; stupid. 'Barren spectators.' Shak.—Barren flowers, in bot. flowers which either bear stamens without a pistil, or which have neither stamens nor pistil.

Barren (bar'-en), n. 1. In the Western States of America, a tract of slightly elevated land, partly prairie and partly covered by small trees, not necessarily barren as the name imports.—2. Any unproductive tract of land; as, the pine barrens of South Carolina.

Barrenly (bar'-en-ly), adv. Unfruitfully.

Barrenness (bar'-en-nes), n. The state or quality of being barren: (a) incapability of producing its kind; want of the power of conception. I prayed for children, and thought barrenness in wedlock a reproach. Milton. (b) Want of fertility; total or partial sterility; infertility; as, the barrenness of the land. (c) Want of the power of producing anything; want of instructiveness, suggestiveness, interest, or the like; want of matter. 'Barrenness of invention.' Dryden.

The barrenness of his fellow students forced him generally into other company at his hours of entertainment. Johnson.

Basilicoid (bā-sil'ik-oid), a. A basilic. Chaucer.

Basilicon (bā-sil'ik-on), n. [L. basilicon, an ointment, from Gr. basilikos, royal, basileus, a king.] An ointment, so called from its supposed royal virtues. It consists of yellow wax, black pitch, and resin, of each one part, and of olive-oil four parts.

Basilica (bā-sil'ik-a), n. pl. Same as Basilica, a code of laws.

Basilidian (bā-sil'id-i-an), n. One of a sect of heretics, followers of Basilides, an Alexandrian Gnostic of the second century, whose system appears to have been a fantastic commixture of the doctrines of Zoroaster and some points of Indian philosophy with Christianity.

Basiliensis (bā-sil'i-ens), n. A genus of saurian reptiles, same as Basiliak, 2 (which see).

Basiliak (bā-sil'ik), n. [Gr. basilikos, lit. little king, from basileus, king, so named from some prominence on the head resembling a crown.] 1. A fabulous creature formerly believed to exist, and variously regarded as a kind of serpent, lizard, or dragon, and sometimes identified with the cockatrice. It inhabited the deserts of Africa, and its breath and even its look was fatal.

There is not one that looketh upon his eyes but he dieth presently. The like property has the basilisk. A white spot or star is on the head and serveth it out like a coronet or diadem. If he but hiss as other serpents dare come near.

Holland.

2. A genus of saurian reptiles (Basiliensis), belonging to the family Iguanidae, distinguished by an elevated crest or row of scales, erectile at pleasure, which, like the dorsal fins of some fishes, runs along the whole length of the back and tail. The mitted or hooded basilisk (B. mitratus) is especially remarkable for a membranous bag at the back of the head, of the size of a small hen's egg, which can be inflated with air at pleasure, and the function of which is analogous to the air-bladder of fishes. The other species have such hoods also, but of a less size. To this organ they owe their name, which recalls the basilisk of fable, though in reality they are exceedingly harmless and lively creatures. The B. ambioensis is a native of the Indian Archipelago, where it is much used for food. It frequents trees overhanging water, into which it drops when alarmed.

3. Mit (a) a large piece of ordnance, now disused, so called after the fabled basilisk, from its destructive powers. Some of them carried an iron ball of the weight of 200 lbs.

(b) In modern times, a cannon of smaller size, from 10 to 15 feet long, carrying a 48-lb. ball; so called from the figure of a snake with which it was ornamented.

Close your port-cullises, charge your basilisks.

Marlowe.

Basilosaurus (bā-sil'ō-sō-rus), n. [Gr. basileus, a king, and saurus, a lizard.] Lit. king-lizard. A name given, from the belief that it was a lizard, to a large fossil mammal, nearly 80 feet in length, related to the whale, found in the eocene beds of Alabama; now termed Zeuglodon (which see).

Basil-thyme (bā-sil'tim), n. A British plant, the Calamintha Acanth of botanists. It has bluish-purple flowers and a fragrant aromatic smell, 'so excellent,' Parkinson says, 'that it is fit for a king's house.'

Basil-weed (bā-sil-wēd), n. Wild basil, or field basil, the common name for Calamintha Clinopodium, a labiate plant common in woods and copses.

Basin (bā'sin), n. [Fr. basin, O. Fr. basin, basin, lit. basin, a basin, a dim. of Fr. bac, a wide open vessel, same as E. back, a brewer's vat. See BACK in this sense.] 1. A vessel or dish of some size, usually circular, rather broad and not very deep, used to hold water for washing, and for various other purposes; a pan. 'A silver basin' full of rose-water. Shak. — 2. Any reservoir for water, natural or artificial, as a pond, a bay, a dock for ships. — 3. In the arte and manu. The inner bark, liber, or endophloem of exogenous trees, especially of the lime or linden, consisting of several layers of fibres. Hemp, flax, jute, are bas fibres.—2. A rope or cord made of the bark of the lime-tree, or the bark made into ropes or mats.—3. A thick mat or hassock. See BASS.

Basta (bas'tā), interj. [It.] Enough! stop! a term not uncommon in our old dramatists.

Basta! content thee, for I have it full. Shak.

Bastard (bas'terd), n. [O.Fr. bastard, bastard (Mod. Fr. bâtard), Sp. Pg. It. bastardo; L.L. bastardus, G. bastard, Icel. bastardr—a word of doubtful etymology. Its first known application was to William the Conqueror, who was called William the Bastard before the Conquest, and, indeed, calls himself so.—Ego Wilhelmus cognomine bastardus. Mann and Little derive it from O.Fr. bas (Fr. bât), a pack-saddle, with the common termination -ard added to it, referring to the old locution ils de bas, son of a pack-saddle, the muleteers being accustomed to use their saddles for beds in the inn. (Comp. G. bänkert, a bastard, from bänk, a bench.) The O.Fr. bas may have been so called because made of bas. Vigfusson (Islandic-English Dict.), in speaking of the Icel. bastardr, suggests another origin:—'This word is, we believe, derived from bás, a 'boose', stall, Goth. banets; its original sense would then be, one born in a stall or crib; hence, as a law term, a bastard; hornungr, from horn (a corner), is an analogous term, comp. Ger. winkel-kind (corner-child), for in ancient Teutonic laws the bastard or outcast was considered as being born in an out-of-the-way place. . . . Literally bastardr means 'boose-hard', the hardy one of the stall, the bastard being the boy who got all kinds of rough usage, and so became hardy.' 1. A natural child; a child begotten and born out of wedlock; an illegitimate or spurious child. By the civil and canon laws, and by the law of Scotland, a bastard becomes a legitimate child by the intermarriage of the parents at any future time. But by the laws of England a child, to be legitimate, must at least be born after the lawful marriage; it does not require that the child shall be begotten in wedlock, but it is indispensable that it should be born after marriage, no matter how short the time, the law presuming it to be the child of the husband. The only incapacity of a bastard is that he cannot be heir, or next of kin, to any one save his own issue. In England the maintenance of a bastard in the first instance devolves on the mother, while in Scotland it is a joint burden upon both parents. The mother is entitled to the custody of the child in preference to the father.—Bastard signé, or bastard elder, in law, the bastard son of a man who afterwards marries the mother, and has a legitimate son, called mulier pueri, or younger.—2. In sugar refining, (a) a kind of impure soft brown sugar obtained from the concentration of the inferior syrups. (b) A large size of mould in which sugar is drained.—3. † A kind of sweet, heady Spanish wine, somewhat of the flavour of muscadell, of which there were two sorts, white and brown.

We shall have all the world drink brown and white bastard. Shak.

I was drunk with bastard. Shak.
Whose nature is to form things like itself,
Heady and monstrous. Beau. & Ft.

Bastard (bas'terd), s. 1. Begotten and born out of lawful matrimony; illegitimate; as, a bastard child.—2. Spurious; not genuine; false; supposititious; adulterate. [In this sense it is applied to things which resemble those which are genuine, but are really not genuine.] 'Bastard hope.' Shak. 'Bastard honour.' Temple.

That bastard self-love, which is so vicious in itself and productive of so many vices. Barrow.

3. † In gun, of an unusual make or proportion, whether longer or shorter: said of pieces of artillery.—4. In geol. applied to rocks and minerals that are impure or contain such admixture of impurity as to render them economically worthless; as, bastard limestone, an impure siliceous limestone incapable of being converted into quicklime when burned. Page.—5. In printing, abbreviated, as the half-title on a page preceding the full title-page of a book.—Bastard indigo. See AMORPHA.—Bastard stucco, in plastering. See STUCCO.—Bastard sugar. Same as Bastard, n. 2.—Bastard type, in printing, type with a face larger or smaller than that usual to a body of given size, as bourgeois on a brier body.—Bastard wheel, in mach. a flat bevel wheel, or one which is a near approach to a spur wheel.

Bath (bath), n. [A Sax. bath, a bath. Common to all the Teutonic tongues save Gothic. O Sax. bat bath. Dan. D. G. bath, a bath.] 1. A vessel for holding water in which to plunge, wash or bathe the body. 2. More generally, an apartment or apparatus by means of which the body or a part of it may be surrounded by any medium differing in nature or temperature from its natural medium. There are so many varieties of baths that it would be endless to endeavour to enumerate all. They have been divided into four classes: (a) According to the substance in which the body is immersed, as, water, oil, compressed air, medicated, mineral, &c. (b) According to manner of application, as, plunge, shower, vapour, douche, spray, &c. (c) According to the parts bathed, as, feet, side, eye, &c. (d) According to temperature, as, hot, tepid, warm, cold. A compressed air bath is taken by remaining for a longer or shorter period in a chamber filled with compressed air. Such baths have been recommended as useful in certain diseases, in which an increased expansive force is required for the air to inflate the more delicate air passages of the lungs. A medicated bath is a liquid or vapour bath designed to produce a curative effect by virtue of some medicine mixed in it.

A natural mineral bath consists of spring water naturally impregnated with some mineral, as iron, sulphur, carbonic acids, &c. Such baths are resorted to by invalids in great numbers, and several towns derive their names from them, as Bath, Baden, Baden, Wiesbaden, &c. Turkish bath, a bath introduced from the East, in which the patient having undergone copious perspiration in an apartment filled with heated air, is afterwards subjected to various processes, as scraping, washing, kneading (shampooing), &c. and, ultimately proceeding to an outer apartment is placed on a couch to cool, meantime sipping coffee, sherbet, &c. Turkish baths or modifications of them are to be found in all our hydropathic establishments, and in most towns of considerable size. The vapour bath, when simply of the steam of water, is the most efficient of all as a detergent. 3. An edifice containing apartments fitted up for bathing, a bath-house. 4. The act of bathing or of exposing the body to some agent, as water, steam, heat, for cleanliness or health. 5. In aromatics and the arts any vessel containing a liquid in which anything is immersed, as in phating the vessel in which solutions are contained. 6. In aromatics, an apparatus for modifying and regulating the heat in various chemical processes, by interposing a quantity of sand, water, or other substance between the fire and the vessel intended to be heated. When a liquid bath of a higher temperature than 212° is required, saturated solutions are employed, in which the boiling-point is higher than that of water. Metal bath, a chemical bath for higher temperatures than can be produced by liquid baths. Mercury, fusible metal, tin, or lead are employed for this purpose. 7. Regalia of the Bath, an order of knighthood supposed to have been instituted at the coronation of Henry IV in 1200. It received this name from the circumstance of the candidate for the honour being put into a bath the preceding evening, to denote a purification or absolution from their former misdeeds, and that they were now to commence a new life. The present order of the Bath, however, was instituted by George I in 1725. It was a military order, and consisted, exclusive of the sovereign, of a grand-master and thirty-six companions. In 1815 the order was greatly extended, and in 1847 opened to civilians. It is now composed of three classes, viz. military and civil knights grand-croixes, O.C.B. knights-commanders, K.C.B. and knights-companions, K.C.B. The badge (fig. 1) is a golden cross of eight points, with the lion of England between the four principal angles, and having in a circle in the centre the rose, thistle, and shamrock, between three imperial crowns, motto, Trio junctis in uno. Stars are also worn by the two first classes. That of the knights grand-croixes (fig. 2) is of silver, with eight points of rays wavy, on which is a gold cross bearing three crowns, encircled by a ribbon displaying the motto of the order, while beneath is a scroll inscribed Qui pro Rege. The star of the commander differs chiefly in wanting the wavy rays.

Bath (bath), n. [Heb.] A Hebrew liquid measure, corresponding to the ephah for dry measure, being like it the tenth part of a homer. See Erua. Bath-brick (bath-brick), n. [From the town of Bath, in Somersetshire.] A preparation of siliceous earth in the form of a brick, used for cleaning knives. It is found in the River Parret, Somersetshire, and is supposed to consist of the siliceous cases of infusoria. Bath-bun (bath-bun), n. [From the town of Bath.] A sort of light sweet roll or bun, generally mixed with currants, &c. Bath-chair (bath-chair), n. [From the town of Bath.] A small carriage capable of being pushed along by an attendant used by invalids. Bathos (bat-tho), v. t. pret. & pp. bathed, pro bathing. [A Sax. bathian, bat bath, Dan. bade, D. and G. baden. See BATH.] 1. To immerse in water, as in the sea, a river, pond, or artificial bath, whether for pleasure, health, or cleanliness.

Chancing to bathe himself in the river Cydnus he fell sick, near unto death, for three days. Boeth. Others, on silver lakes and rivers bathed. These downy brooks. Milton.

2. To apply water or other liquid to with a sponge, cloth, or the like, generally for therapeutic purposes, as, let the wound be bathed twice a day. [In this use bathing differs from washing in being much longer continued.] 3. To wash, moisten, or suffuse with any liquid. 'Her bosom bathed in blood.' Dryden.—4. To immerse in or surround with anything analogous to water, as, bathed in sunlight. 'Thy rosy shadows bathe me.' Tennyson.

One cup of this. Milton. I watched it lying bathed to the green gleam of dew lashed leaves. Tennyson.

Bathe (bathe), v. t. 1. To be or lie in a bath, to be in water or in other liquid, to go into water to bathe one's self.

They bathe in summer, and in winter slide. Mallet 2. To be immersed or surrounded as if with water.

Bathe (bathe), n. Act of bathing, the immersion of the body in water, as, to take once a usual bath. Milton. bathe. [This noun seems to be confined to Scotland, where a distinction is made between a bath and a bath, the former being applied to an immersion in a sea, river, or lake, and the latter to a bath for which artificial apparatus is used.]

Bather (bathe-er), n. 1. One who bathes, one who immerses himself in water. 2. One who bathes another.

Bathetic (ba-thet-ic), n. [From bathos, on type of pathetic from pathos.] Relating to bathos, sinking. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Bathing-box (bathe-ing-box), n. A fixed covered shed in which bathers dress and undress.

Bathing-machine (bathe-ing-ma-shin), n. A covered vehicle, driven into the water, in which bathers dress and undress.

Bathing-tub (bathe-ing-tub), n. A vessel for bathing, made of wood, lined iron, or zinc, a portable bath.

Bath-kol (bathe-kol), n. A sort of divination practised among the ancient Jews, according to which the first words uttered after an appeal was made to Bath-kol were considered oracular. Beza.

Bath-metal (bathe-met-al), n. An alloy of copper and zinc in nearly equal proportions.

Bathometer (ba-tho-met-er), n. [O Fr. bathos, depth and metron, a measure.] An apparatus for taking soundings, especially one in which a sounding-line is dispensed with.

Bath-oolite (bathe-ool-ite), n. Same as Bath stone.

Bat-horse (bat-horse or bat-horse), n. [O Fr. bat O Fr. bat, a pack-saddle.] 1. A horse allowed to a batman in the British army for conveying the stores in his charge. 2. A horse for carrying baggage belonging to an officer or to the baggage train.

Bathos (bat-thos), n. [O Fr. bathos from bathos, deep.] A ludicrous descent from the elevated to the mean in writing or speech, a sinking; anti-climax.

Bath-room (bathe-room), n. A room for bathing in.

Bath-stone (bathe-stone), n. [From being largely used for building in Bath and neighbourhood.] A species of limestone, called also Bath-stone and Blue-stone from its being composed of small rounded grains resembling the roe of a fish. This member of the oolite formation has been called the great oolite, it is of considerable thickness, and yields an abundant supply of freestone for building, and is extensively worked near Bath. When first quarried it is soft, but it soon becomes hard by exposure to the atmosphere.

Bathytis (ba-thyt-is), n. [O Fr. bathys, deep, and tytis life.] Huxley's name for masses of animal matter said to be found covering the sea bottom at great depths, and in such abundance as to form in some places deposits of upwards of 50 feet in thickness. It is described as consisting of a tenacious, viscid, slimy substance, and exhibiting under the microscope a network of granular nucleifigous matter, which expands and contracts spontaneously, forming a very simple organism, and corresponding in all respects to protoplasm (which see). Embedded in it are calcareous bodies with an organic structure, called discoidea, conosites, and comospheres, which seem to belong to bathytis as such. Some men of science, however, doubt the existence of such a substance, maintaining that the apparent signs of an organic life in the matter which Huxley examined were due to the alcohol in which the matter was preserved. Recently, however, the North-polar navigator Beemels has reported the discovery in Smith Sound, at the depth of 92 fathoms, of a free, undifferentiated, homogeneous protoplasm, to which he has given the name of Protobathysius.

Bathyergus (bat'i-ér-gus), n. [Gr. bathys, deep, and ergon, a work.] The genus of mammals to which the sandmole or sandmole of the Dutch boers of South Africa (B. suillus) belongs; called also the Coast-rat. It is a burrowing animal found in large numbers around the Cape of Good Hope, where it drives such multitudes of shallow tunnels that the ground is rendered dangerous for horsemen. The fur is grayish-brown, and might be a valuable article of commerce. It is of the size of a wild rabbit, and belongs to the family Spalacidae.

Bathymetrical (bat'i-met'ri-kal), a. Pertaining to bathymetry, or to depth under water.

Bathymetry (ba-thim-et'ri), n. [Gr. bathys, deep, and metron, measure.] The art of sounding or of measuring depths in the sea.

Batidæm (ba-tid'ê-ê), n. pl. A nat. order instituted by Martius for the Batis maritima, a succulent shrub growing in salt marshes in the West Indies, sometimes used in West India pickles. It has the habit of Salicornia, but its ovary has four cells, with one erect ovule in each cell, and is consequently placed in a separate but closely allied nat. order to Chenopodiaceæ.

Bating (bat'ing), Originally a part, but now used chiefly as a prep. Abating; taking away; deducting; excepting.

Children have few ideas, bating some faint ideas of hunger and thirst.

Lodge.

Batis (bat'is), n. A genus of saline plants, containing a single species. See BATIDÆM.

Batist, Batiste (bat'ist), n. [Fr. batiste, O. Fr. baptiste. From the name of its inventor Baptiste, a linen weaver of Cambrai, in French Flanders. His statue still stands there.] 1. A fine linen cloth made in Flanders and Picardy, of three different kinds or thicknesses; cambric. — 2. An East India goods of similar quality.

Batler (bat'ler), n. See BATLER.

Batlet (bat'let), n. [Dim. of bat.] A small bat or square piece of wood with a handle for beating linen when taken out of the buck. Called also Batler, Batril.

I remember the kissing of her batlet, and the cow's dugs that her pretty chopt hands had milked. Shak.

Batman (bat'man), n. An oriental weight. In Bokhara it is equal to 291 lbs.; in Turkey the great batman is about 157½ lbs., the lesser only a fourth of the greater; at Aleppo and Smyrna the batman weighs but 17 lbs.; in Persia 13½ lbs.

Batman (bat'man), n. [Fr. bat, a pack-saddle. See BAT, a pack-saddle.] A person allowed by the government to every company of a regiment on foreign service. His duty is to take charge of the cooking utensils, &c., of the company. There is in the charge of the batman a bat-horse for each company to convey the cooking utensils from place to place.

Bat-money, Raw-money (bat'mun-ni, bat'mun-ni), n. Money paid to a batman.

Batolite (bat'ô-lit), n. [Fr. baton, a staff, and Gr. lithos, a stone.] A genus of straight, cylindrical, bivalve fossil shells, allied to the hippurites. Some are of great length, and form masses of rock in the high Alps.

Baton (bat'on), n. [Fr. baton, O. Fr. baston. See BASTE, BASTLE.] 1. A staff or club; a truncheon, the official badge of various officials of widely different rank; thus we have the baton of a field-marshal, of a constable or policeman, and of a conductor of music. 'He held the baton of command.' Prescott.

When I went home I made myself a baton, and went about the fields conducting an orchestra. Dickens.

Batoon (ba-tôn'), n. A club or truncheon. Although his shoulders with batoons Be claw'd and cudgel'd to some tune. Hudibras.

Bat-printing (bat'print-ing), n. The mode of printing pottery adopted when the printing is done on the glazed ware. For this mode of printing a fine-lined engraving is executed on copper, after which the lines of the engraving are filled with pure linseed-oil, which is taken off by a sheet of a flexible preparation of glue, by means of which it is applied to the surface of the ware. Finely-ground colour is dusted on, and the vessel is then ready to be fired in the enamel kiln. See PRESS-PRINTING.

Batrachia (ba-trá'ki-a), n. pl. [Gr. batrachos, a frog.] The fourth order in Cuvier's arrangement of the class Reptilia. It comprises frogs, toads, newts, salamanders, and sirens, and is equivalent to the class Amphibia (which see). It is now usually restricted to the order Anura, or amphibians which lose the tail when they reach maturity. The Batrachia when young undergo metamorphosis and breathe only by gills. When adults they breathe by lungs, or, as in the case of the axolotl, siren, and proteus, by both lungs and gills. They are oviparous, and deposit eggs covered only by a soft membrane.

Batrachian (ba-trá'ki-an), a. [Gr. batrachos, a frog.] 1. In zool. pertaining to the order Batrachia. — 2. In bot. applied to the aquatic species of the genus Ranunculus, which have been placed in a special genus (Batrachium) by some authors.

Batrachian (ba-trá'ki-an), n. An animal of the order Batrachia.

Batrachite (bat-ra-kít), n. [Gr. batrachos, a frog.] 1. A fossil or stone in colour resembling a frog; toadstone. — 2. A variety of the mineral chrysolite, composed of silicates of lime and magnesia, in colour resembling the frog, and found in the mountains of Southern Tyrol. See OLIVIN.

Batrachoid (bat-ra-koid), a. Having the form of a frog; pertaining to the Batrachia.

Batracholite (ba-trá'k'ô-lit), n. [Gr. batrachos, a frog, and lithos, a stone.] The name given to fossil remains of animals of the frog kind, found in the tertiary formations. In the newer tertiary strata near Oeningen, on the Rhine, several species of frogs, toads, and newts have been discovered.

Batrachomyomachy (bat-ra-kom'í-om'á-ki), n. [Gr. batrachos, a frog, mys, a mouse, and machê, a battle.] A battle between the frogs and mice, the name of a kind of parody on the Iliad.

Batrachophagous (bat-ra-kof'a-gus), a. [Gr. batrachos, a frog, and phagein, to eat.] Feeding on frogs.

Batrachospermæe (ba-trá'k'ô-spér'mê-ê), n. pl. [Gr. batrachos, a frog, and sperma, seed.] A family of fresh-water coniferoid algae, that have articulated stems, with whorls of necklace-like branches, and the spores in chains.

Batrachus (bat-ra-kus), n. [Gr. batrachos, a frog.] The frog-fish genus. See FROG-FISH.

Bat-shell (bat'shel), n. A species of Voluta of a dusky brown colour.

Batsman (bat'sman), n. The man who wields the bat in the game of cricket; the batter.

Batster (bat'ster), n. Same as Batsman.

Bat's-wing Burner, n. A form of gas-burner from which there issues a jet supposed to resemble a bat's wing.

Specifically—3. A body of infantry, varying from about 300 to 1000 men, and usually forming a division of a regiment. Sometimes, however, a single battalion composes a regiment.

Battalioned (bat-tál'yond), a. Formed into battalions.

Battel (bat'tel), n. [See BATTLE.] Battle. — Wager of battel, in law, a species of trial for the decision of causes between parties. This species of trial is of high antiquity among the rude military peoples of Europe. It was introduced into England by William the Conqueror, and used in three cases only: in the court-martial, or court of chivalry or honour; in appeals of felony; and in issues joined upon a writ of right. The contest was held before the judges on a piece of ground inclosed, and the combatants were bound to fight till the stars appeared, unless the death or defeat of one party sooner decided the contest. The weapons used were batons or staves an ell long. Women, priests, men above sixty, and lame and blind persons might appear by champions. Though long fallen into desuetude, it was a valid and legal mode of trial in England down to 1818, and was then abolished in consequence of the defendant in a suit having demanded this mode of arbitrament, and its being found that it could not legally be denied him.

Battel (bat'tel), n. [O. E. bat, increase, and del, portion.] 1. An account of the expenses of a student at Oxford. — 2. pl. Provisions taken by Oxford students from the buttery; and also the charges thereon. — 2. Battering-gun (bat'tér-ing-gun), n. Milit. A cannon of heavy calibre adapted for demolishing defensive works.

Battering-ram (bat'tér-ing-ram), n. 1. In milit. engin. an engine used to beat down the walls of besieged places, consisting of a large beam, with a head of iron somewhat resembling the head of a ram, whence its name. In its simplest form it was carried and forcibly driven against the wall by the hands of the soldiers, but more commonly it was suspended by ropes to a beam which was supported by posts, and balanced so as to swing backward and forward, being in this way impelled against the wall with much more ease and effect. It was also Batter-rule, Battering-rule (bat'tér-röl, bat'tér-ing-röl), n. A plumb-line so contrived that while the plummet hangs vertically, the wall to which it is applied may be sloping or battered. It consists of a plumb-line attached to a triangular frame, one side of which is fixed at the required angle with the line.

Battery (bat'tér-i), n. [Fr. batterie, from battre, to beat. See BATTER.] 1.† The act of battering; attack or assault, with the view of beating down, as by battering-ram or ordnance.

At one place above the rest, by continual batterie there was such a breach as the towns lay open and naked to the enemy. Holland.

2. The instrument or agency employed in battering or attacking; as, a battery of guns; a battery of abuse. Specifically.—3. Milit. A body of cannon for field operations consisting generally of from four to eight guns (in the British service usually six), with complement of waggons, artillerymen, &c.

4. The personnel or complement of officers and men attached to such a battery.—5. In fort. a parapet thrown up to cover the guns, and others employed about them from the enemy's shot, with the guns employed.

—Cross batteries, two batteries which play athwart each other, forming an angle upon the object battered.—En-échappe batteries, a battery which plays obliquely on the enemy's lines.—Enfilade battery, a battery which scours or sweeps the whole line or length.—En-revers battery, one which plays upon the enemy's back.—Floating batteries, batteries erected either on simple rafts or on the hulls of ships, for the defence of the coast, or for the bombardment of the enemy's ports.—6. In law, the unlawful beating of another. The least degree of violence, or even the touching of another in anger, constitutes a battery.—7. In elect. a number of coated jars placed in such a manner that they may be charged at the same time, and discharged in the same manner.—Galvanic battery, a pile or series of plates of copper and zinc, or of any substances susceptible of galvanic action. See under GALVANIC.

Battery-gun (bat'tér-i-gun), n. Milit. A gun which can fire a number of shots consecutively or simultaneously without stopping to reload; a gun with several barrels, or with one barrel and several chambers like a revolver pistol, such as the Gatling gun or the mitrailleuse.

Battil; Battill (bat'tíl), v. t. [See BATTLE, v. and v. t.] To make fat; to render fertile; to batten.

Ashes are marvellous improvements to battil barren land. Ray.

Battil, Battill (bat'tíl), v. i. To become fat.

Sleep, they said, would make her battill better. Spenser.

Batting (bat'ing), n. 1. The management of a bat at play; as, the batting of the Eleven was excellent.—2. Cotton or wool in masses prepared for quilts or bed-covers.

Battish (bat'tish), a. [From bat, the animal.] Of or pertaining to, or resembling a bat.

She clasp'd his limbs, by impious labour tired, With battish limbs. Vernon.

Battle (bat'tl), n. [Fr. bataille, a battle, and formerly also, a division of an army, from L. battalia, battualia, the fighting and fencing exercises of soldiers and gladiators; from battuere, to beat, to strike, to fence.] 1. A fight or encounter between enemies or opposing armies; an engagement: usually applied to armies or large bodies of men, but applicable also to a combat between individuals, whether men or inferior animals.—2.† A body of forces, or division of an army; a battalion.

The king divided his army into three battles, whereof the vanguard only with wings came to fight. Bacon.

3.† More specifically, (a) the main or middle body of the army or fleet, as distinguished from the van and rear.

Angus led the avant-guard, himself followed with the battle a good distance behind, and after came the arrier. Sir J. Hayward.

The centre, or battle as it was called, consisting of sixty-three galleys, was led by John of Austria. Prescott.

(b) That portion of the army, wherever placed and of whatever consisting, regarded as of main importance.

The cavalry, by way of distinction, was called the battle, and on it alone depended the fate of every action. Robertson.

4.† An army prepared for or engaged in fight. 'Heralds' twixt two dreadful battles set.' Shak.—5.† A formidable array similar to an army in battle order.

On his bow-back he hath a battle set Of bristly pikes, that ever threat his foes. Shak.

—To give battle, to attack an enemy; to join battle, properly to meet the attack, but perhaps this distinction is not always observed.

—A pitched battle, one in which the armies are previously drawn up in form, with a regular disposition of the forces.—A drawn battle, one in which neither party gains the victory.—A battle royal, (a) a battle with fists or cudgels, in which more than two are engaged; a mêlée. (b) A fight of game-cocks, in which more than two are engaged. [Provincial].—Battle, Fight, Combat, Engagement, Conflict. Battle embraces all the movements and manœuvres in face of the enemy, as well as the actual contact of the soldiery, and implies premeditation. It is the appropriate word for great engagements; as, the battle of Waterloo, Trafalgar. Fight has reference to actual conflict; a man may take part in a battle, and have no share in the fighting. A battle may be made up of many subordinate *fight*s; as, the battle of the Alma, but the fight at the flag-staff, &c. Combat is a word of greater dignity than fight, but agrees with it in denoting close encounter. Engagement supposes distinctly organized bodies engaged in contact with the enemy. Conflict, lit. a clashing together, implies fierce physical encounter.

Battle (bat'tl), v. i. pret. & pp. battled; ppr. battling. To join in battle; to contend in fight, or any kind of struggle; to struggle; to strive or exert one's self. 'To meet in arms and battle in the plain.' Prior. 'Who battled for the True, the Just.' Tennyson.

Battle (bat'tl), v. t. 1.† To cover with armed force. Fairfax.—2. To strengthen with battlements; to embattle.

Beacon-fire (bē'kn-fir), n. A fire lighted up as a beacon or signal; a signal fire.

Bead (bēd), n. [A. Sax. bed, bead, a prayer, from biddan, to pray. Beads are used by Roman Catholics to keep them right as to the number of their prayers, one bead of their rosary being dropped every time a prayer is said; hence the transference of the name from that which is counted (the prayers) to that which is used to count them. So in Sp. and Pg. cuanta, conta, a bead, is from contar, to count. The old phrase to bid one's beads means to say one's prayers. See BID.] 1. A prayer. 'Saying over a number of beads, not understood or minded on.' Inflections to the Clergy, 1541.—2. A little perforated ball of gold, pearl, amber, glass, or the like, to be strung on a thread, the string thus formed being either worn round the neck as an ornament, and called a necklace, or used, under the name of a rosary, by Roman Catholics in numbering their prayers, one bead being passed at the end of each ejaculation or short prayer; hence the phrase to tell one's beads, literally to number one's prayers, but used simply in the sense of to say one's prayers.

Ere yet, in scorn of Peter's pence,

And number'd bead, and shrift,

Bluff Harry broke into the spence,

And turn'd the cow's adrift. Tennyson.

3 Any small globular body, as a small piece of metal on a gun-barrel to take aim by, a drop of liquid, and the like.

Beads of sweat have stood upon thy brow. Shak.

4 In chem. a glass globe for trying the strength of spirits. Beads are numbered according to their specific gravities, and the strength of the spirit is denominated by the number of that one which remains suspended in it, and neither sinks to the bottom nor floats on the surface. Beads, in determining the strength of spirits, are now for the most part superseded by the hydrometer.

5 In arch. and joinery, a small round moulding sometimes cut into short embossments, like pearls in a necklace; an astragal.

The bead is of frequent occurrence in architecture, particularly in the classical styles, and is used in picture-frames and other objects carved in wood. Among joiners beads are variously modified, as (a) Bead and butt, framed work, where the panel is flush with the framing, and has a bead run

Bead-proof (bēd'prōf), a. 1. A term applied to spirituous liquors on whose surface, after being shaken, a crown of bubbles will stand for some time.—2. A term applied to spirit which comes up to a certain standard of strength, as ascertained by beads. See BEAD.

Bead-roll (bēd'rōl), n. In the R. Cath. Ch. a list or catalogue of persons for the repose of whose souls a certain number of prayers is to be said or counted off on the beads of a chaplet rosary; a roll of prayers or hymns; hence, any list or catalogue. 'The bead-roll of her vicious tricks.' Prior.

Den Chaucer, well of English undefiled

On Fame's eternal bead-roll worthy to be filed.

Spenser.

Beads-man (bēd'sman), n. 1. A man employed in praying, generally in praying for another. In this sense the word was used in former times at the conclusion of petitions or letters to great men as we now use 'servant' or 'humble servant.'

Whereby ye shall bind me to be your poor beads-man for ever unto almighty God. Fuller.

2. One who resides in a beds-house, or is supported from its funds.—3. A privileged beggar. [Scotch.] In this last use spelled more frequently Bedeaman (which see).

Bead-snake (bēd'snāk), n. The popular name of the Elops fulvius, a beautiful snake of North America, inhabiting cultivated grounds, especially plantations of the sweet-potato, and burrowing in the ground. It is finely marked with yellow, carmine, and black. Though it possesses poison-fangs it never seems to use them.

Beads-woman (bēd'swu-man), n. 1. A praying woman: sometimes used as equivalent to 'humble servant.' (See BRADSMAN). 'Honour done to your poor beads-woman.' B. Jonson.—2. A woman who resides in an alms-house.

Bead-tool (bēd'tōl), n. A turning tool which has its cutting face ground to a concave curve, so that it may produce a convex moulding when applied to the work.

Bead-tree (bēd'trē), n. The Melia Azedarach, nat. order Meliaceae. Its nuts are used for beads in necklaces by Roman Catholics, especially in Spain and Portugal; hence the name. See MELIA.

Beady (bēd'i), a. Bead-like.

Miss Crawley could not look without seeing Mr. But's beady eyes eagerly fixed on her. Thackeray.

Beagle (bē'gl), n. [Origin unknown. By some conjectured to be of Celtic origin; Ir. and Gael. beag, little.] 1. A small hound, formerly kept to hunt hares, now almost superseded by the harrier, which sometimes is called by its name. The beagle is smaller than the harrier, compactly built, smooth-haired, and with pendulous ears. The smallest of them are little larger than the lap-dog.

To plains with well-bred beagles we repair,
And trace the mazes of the circling hare. Pope.

2. A local name for several species of the smaller sharks.—3. A catch-poll; a bum-bailiff. [Scotch.]

There beagles flew

To hound the souter lads in order. J. Mayne.

Beak (bēk), n. [O. E. beak, bek, bec, &c., from Fr. bec, It. becco, L. beccus, a beak, from the Celtic—Armor. bek, beg, Ir. and Gael. bec, a beak. Formerly bec in French was applied to several weapons of the pike or halberd kind, hence possibly meaning 3.] 1. In zool. (a) the bill or neb of a bird. (b) The prolongation of the mouth or mandibles of some fishes, reptiles, and insects, in form analogous to the beak of a bird. (c) The upper or projecting part of the shell near the hinge of a bivalve, as in the clam. (d) The narrow prolongation of a univalve shell beyond the aperture in the axial line, containing what is usually called the cardinal.—2. Anything ending in a point like a beak; as, (a) naut. a pointed piece of wood fortified with brass, fastened to the prow of ancient galleys, and intended to pierce the vessels of an enemy; a similar, but infinitely more powerful appendage of iron or steel affixed immediately under the water-line to the prow of modern ram-ships. (See RAM.) Also, that part of a ship before the foremast which is fastened to the stem and supported by the main knee.

(b) The horn of an anvil. (c) In farriery, a little shoe at the toe about an inch long, turned up and fastened in upon the fore part of the hoof. (d) In arch. a little fillet left on the edge of a larder, which forms a channel behind for preventing the water from running down the lower bed of the cornice. (e) In bot. a process, terminating the fruit of certain plants, as of saxifrage and geraniums.—3. A magistrate; a judge; a policeman. [Slang.]

Beak (bēk), v. t. Among cock-fighters, to take hold with the beak.

Beaked (bēkt), a. Having a beak or something resembling a beak; beak-shaped; as, (a) ending in a point, like a beak. 'Each beaked promontory.' Milton. (b) Having a long beak-like mouth, as some insects. (c) In bot. terminated by a process in the shape of a bird's beak; rostrate.

Beaker (bēk'ar), n. [Sc. bicker, Icel. bikarr, Dan. bæger, D. beker, G. becher, a beaker, a drinking vessel, from L. L. bicarium, a cup, from Gr. bikos, a wine-jar.] A large drinking cup or glass.

O for a beaker full of the warm south,

Full of the true, the blushing Hippocrene! Keats.

Béal (bēl), n. [See BOIL.] A small inflammatory tumour; a pustule.

Béal (bēl), v. t. To gather matter; to swell and come to a head, as a pimple; to fester; to suppurate. [Old English and Scotch.]

Béal, Bial (bēl), n. [Gael.] A mouth; an opening, as between hills; a narrow pass. [Scotch.]

Angus M'Aulay mumbled over a number of hard Gaelic names descriptive of the different paces, pre-cipices, corries, and béals, through which he said the road lay to Iverary. Sir W. Scott.

Be-all (bē'āl), n. All that is to be.

Might be the be-all and end-all here. Shak.

Beam (bēm), n. [A. Sax. bedm, a beam, a post, a tree, a ray of light; D. boom, G. baum, Goth. bagme, a tree. The secondary sense of ray is evidently from the resemblance of sunbeams to straight shafts; comp. L. radius, a ray, a spoke of a wheel, a rod, and G. strahl, an arrow, a spoke, a ray or beam.] 1. A long straight and strong piece of wood, iron, or steel, especially when holding an important place in some structure, and serving for support or consolidation; a long piece fixed or movable in a machine or tool: often equivalent to girder. It is used in a number of more or less specific senses; as, (a) any large piece of timber long in proportion to its thickness, prepared for use. (b) One of the principal horizontal timbers in a building, especially one connecting two opposite rafters; a timber serving to strengthen any piece of wooden framework. (c) The part of a balance from the ends of which the scales are suspended. 'The doubtful beam long nods from side to side.' Pope.—To kick the beam, to rise as the lighter scale of a balance does so as to strike against the beam when it becomes oblique; hence, to be very light.

In these he put two weights,
The sequel each of puring and of fight;
The latter quick upbore and kicked the beam.
Milton.

(d) The pole of a carriage which runs between the horses. (e) A cylindrical piece of wood, making part of a loom, on which weavers wind the warp before weaving; also, the cylinder on which the cloth is rolled as it is woven.

The staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam.
Sam. xxii. 7.

(f) The straight part or shank of an anchor. (g) One of the strong transverse pieces of timber stretching across a ship from one side to the other to support the decks and retain the sides at their proper distance. From the beams extending quite across the vessel where it is broadest, the term is often used to express the width of a ship; thus, a wide vessel is said to have more beam than a narrow one.—On the beam, on a line with the beams, or at right angles with the keel. Aboard the beam, before the beam, are similar phrases.—On the weather beam, on the weather side of the ship.—On the beam ends, a phrase indicating the position of a ship which inclines so much to one side that her beams approach a vertical position; hence, fig. to be on one's beam ends, to be thrown or lying on the ground; to be in bad circumstances; to be at one's last shift. (h) The main piece of a plough, in which the plough-tails are fixed, and by which it is drawn. (i) The oscillating lever of a steam-engine turning upon a centre, and forming the medium of communication between the piston-rod and the crank-shaft. Called also Working or Walking Beam.—Beam centre, the fulcrum or pin on which the working-beam vibrates. Called also Beam Gudgeon.—2. The main stem of a deer's horns bearing the snags or antlers. One of the snags themselves is sometimes called the beam antler. 3. A ray of light, or more strictly a collection of parallel rays of light emitted from the sun or other luminous body. The middle ray is the axis.

Yon silver beams,
Sleep they less sweetly on the cottage thatch
Than on the dome of kings? Shelley.

of both hemispheres, but now found in considerable numbers only in North America, living in colonies, but occurring solitary in Central Europe and Asia. It has short ears; a blunt nose, small fore-foot, large webbed hind-foot, with a flat ovate tail covered with scales on its upper surface. It is valued for its fur, which used to be largely employed in the manufacture of hats, but for which silk is now for the most part substituted, and for an odoriferous secretion named castor (which see). Its food consists of the bark of trees, leaves, roots, and berries. The favorite haunts of the beaver are rivers and lakes which are bordered by forests. When they find a stream not sufficiently deep for their purpose they throw across it a dam constructed with great ingenuity of wood, stones, and mud. In winter they live in houses, which are 3 to 4 feet high, are built on the water's edge, and afford them protection from wolves and other wild animals. There are several varieties, as C. negro, or black beaver, C. albus, or white beaver, and C. varius, or spotted beaver. — 2. The fur of the beaver. — 3. A hat made of beaver-fur. — 4. A brown beaver steepled over his eyes. — 5. A kind of strong folded cloth used for making overcoats.

Before (bē-fōr'), prep. [A. Sax. before, be-foran—prefix be, and foran, fora.] 1. In front of; at the fore part of; preceding in space; as, before the house; before the fire. 'Who shall go before them?' Milton.—2. In presence of; in sight of.

Abraham bowed down himself before the people of the land. Gen. xxiii. 12.

3. Under the cognizance, jurisdiction, or consideration of.

The cause of both parties shall come before the judges. Ex. xiii. 9.

4. Preceding in time; as, I will return before six o'clock. [Like after, this word often precedes a clause, as a governing preposition, and thus has the function of a conjunction.]

Before I was afflicted, I went astray. Ps. cxix. 67.

Before this treatise can become of use two points are necessary. Swift.

Formerly the clause thus governed by before was often introduced by the conjunction that.

Jesus answered and said unto him, Before that Philip called thee, . . . I saw thee. Jn. i. 48.

5. In preference to; prior to; having precedence of in rank, dignity, or the like.

He that cometh after me is preferred before me: for he was before me. Jn. i. 15.

Beg, Bay (beg, bā), n. [Turk. begh, pron. bā.] In Turkey, a governor; more particularly, the lord of a sanjak or banner. The title, however, is used with no great regard to accuracy, and is frequently given to superior officers and persons of rank. In Tunis the beg or bey is the prince or king.

Beg (beg), v. t. pret. & pp. begged; ppr. begging. [Perhaps from the noun beggar (which see).] More probably, however, a shortened form of an old bedegian, bedecian, to beg (the latter found in King Alfred's translation of Pope Gregory's Pastoral Care), from root bid in A. Sax. bidan, to beg, to ask; comp. Goth. bidagan, a beggar, from same root. 1. To ask or supplicate in charity. 'Nor his seed begging bread.' Ps. xxxvii. 26.—2. To ask for earnestly.

Joseph begged the body of Jesus. Mat. xxvii. 58.

3. To ask earnestly; to beseech; to entreat or supplicate with humility; as, I begged him to use his influence in favour of my friend.—4. To take for granted; to assume without proof; as, to beg the question in debate.

We have not begged any principles or suppositions for the proof of this. T. Burnet.

[The phrase I beg is often used as a polite formula for introducing a question or communication; as, I beg to inquire, I beg to state. It may be regarded as elliptical for I beg leave to.]—To beg a person for a fool, t. to be appointed his guardian.

In the old common law was a writ . . . under which if a man was legally proved an idiot, the profit of his lands . . . might be granted by the king to any subject. Such a person, when this grant was asked, was said to be begged for a fool. Nares.

—Ask, Demand, Claim, Require, Beg, Beseech. See under ASK.—STN. To entreat, solicit, implore, supplicate, beseech, petition, crave, request, ask.

Beg (beg), v. t. To ask alms or charity; to practise begging; to live by asking alms.

And thus gate I begged.

Without bagge other botel

But my wombe one. Piers Plowman.

I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed. Luke xvi. 3.

Bega, Bigga (bē-ga, big-ga), n. [Hind. bighā.] A Bengal land-measure, about one-third of an English acre.

Begad (bē-gad'), interj. [A corruption of by God.] A sort of exclamatory oath, employed to give weight to a statement.

Begad, madam, . . . 'tis the very same I met. Fielding.

Begot (bē-got'), v. t. pret. begot, begat; pp. begot, begotten; ppr. begetting. [A. Sax. begitan, begitan—prefix be, and gitan, to get.]

1. To procreate, as a father or sire; to generate; as, to begot a son. 'Yet they a beauteous offspring shall begot.' Milton.

2. To produce, as an effect; to cause to exist; to generate; as, luxury begots vice. 'Love is begot by fancy.' Granville.

Beggetter (bē-get-ter), n. One who begets or procreates; a father.

Beggable (bē-ga-bil'), a. Capable of being begged. 'Things disposed of or not beggable.' Bulwer.

Beggar (beg-gēr), n. [Etymology doubtful. The old derivation was from bag, in which case a beggar meant originally one who carried a bag or wallet. Bagger would be converted into waggar by a slight change of vowel sounds, but the spelling bagger does not seem to occur anywhere. The bag was certainly in former times regarded as the distinguishing badge of the beggar. 'It must be borne in mind that the bag was a universal characteristic of the beggar at a time when all his alms were given in kind, and a beggar is hardly ever introduced in our older writers without mention being made of his bag.' Wedgwood. See the quotation below, and one under BEG, v. t. Probably the name is from the verb, a recently proposed etymology of which is given above.] 1. One that lives by asking alms or makes it his business to beg for charity.

Biddes and beggers

Fast about yede,

With hire belien and here beggers

Of brede full yccrammed. Piers Plowman.

2. One who supplicates with humility; a petitioner: in this sense rarely used, as the word has become a term of contempt.

What subjects will precarious kings regard?

A beggar speaks too softly to be heard. Dryden.

3. One who assumes in argument what he does not prove. 'These shameful beggers of principles.' Tillotson.—To go or go home by beggar's bush, to go to ruin. Brewer.

Beggar (beg-gēr), v. t. To reduce to beggary; to impoverish; fig. to exhaust the resources of; to exhaust. 'It beggared all description.' Shak. With of. 'Beggared of blood.' Shak.

Whose heavy hand hath bow'd you to the grave,

And beggar'd yours for ever. Shak.

Beggarliness (beg-gēr-li-ness), n. The state of being beggary; meanness; extreme poverty.

Beggarly (beg-gēr-ly), a. In the condition of or becoming a beggar; extremely indigent; poor; mean; contemptible: used of persons and things. 'A beggarly account of empty boxes.' Shak.

Beggarly sins, that is, those sins which idleness and beggary usually betray men to, such as lying, flattery, stealing, and dissimulation. Jer. Taylor.

Beggarly (beg-gēr-ly), adv. Meanly; indigently; despicably.

It is his delight to dwell beggarly. Hooker.

have or hold.] 1.† To restrain; to govern; to subdue.

He did behave his anger ere 'twas spent.

Shak. Tim. of Ath. iii. 5. 22.

[Perhaps a solitary example. The old editions read behoove in this passage.]—2. With the reflexive pronoun, to conduct one's self; to demean one's self. 'Those that behaved themselves manfully.' 2 Maccab. ii. 21.

We behaved not ourselves deservingly among you.

2 Thea. iii. 7.

3.† To employ or occupy.

Where ease abounds y'ts cath to doe amiss: But who his limbs with labours, and his mynd Behaves with cares, cannot so easy mis. Spenser.

—To be behaved, to conduct or behave one's self; to be of a certain behaviour, generally in the compound adjectives ill-behaved and well-behaved.

Gather by him, as he is behaved, If't be the affliction of his love, or no, That thus he suffers for. Shak.

Behave (bê-hâv'), v.t. To act; to conduct one's self: generally used with regard to manners or to conduct in any particular business, and in a good or bad sense; as, he behaves well or ill: sometimes applied to inanimate objects; as, the ship behaved well in the gale.

Behaviour (bê-hâv'yér), n. [From behave, with a rather peculiar termination.] 1. Manner of behaving, whether good or bad; conduct; mode of acting; manners; deportment: sometimes equivalent to good breeding or proper deportment. 'A gentleman that is very singular in his behaviour.' Steele.

He who adviseth the philosopher, altogether devoted to the Muses, sometimes to offer sacrifice to the altars of the Graces, thought knowledge imperfect without behaviour. Watson.

2. The manner in which anything acts, especially under extraordinary conditions or in critical circumstances, as a ship in a storm.

The phenomena of electricity and magnetism were reduced to the same category; and the behaviour of the magnetic needle was assimilated to that of a needle subjected to the influence of artificial electric currents. H. Spencer.

3.† The act of representing another person; the manner in which one personates the character of another; representative character. [Very rare, possibly unique. Knight, however, believes that the word is used here in its natural sense, that is, the manner of having or conducting himself.]

King John. Now, say, Chatillon, what would France with us?

Chas. Thos. after greeting, speaks the king of France, in my behaviour, to the majesty, The borrow'd majesty of England here. Shak.

—Behaviour as heir, or gestio pro herede, in Scots law, a passive title, by which an heir, by intromission with his ancestor's heritage, incurs a universal liability for his debts and obligations. — During good behaviour, as long as one remains blameless in the discharge of one's duties; as, an office held during good behaviour. — On one's good behaviour, behaving or bound to behave with a regard to conventional decorum and propriety. [Colloq.] — Upon one's behaviour, in a state of probation; liable to be called to account in case of misconduct.

Behave (bê-hâv'), v.t. [Prefix be, and head.] To cut off the head of; to sever the head from the body of, with a cutting instrument.

Russell and Sidney were beheaded in defiance of law and justice. Macaulay.

Beheld (bê-hêld'), pret. & pp. of behold.

Behemoth (bê-hê-moth), n. [Heb. b'hemoth, plural of excellence of behemah, a beast—hence, signifying a beast of the larger kind.] An animal described in Job xl. 15–24. Authorities are divided in opinion as to the animal intended, some supposing it to be an ox, others an elephant, hippopotamus, crocodile, mastodon, &c., while many regard it simply as a type or representation of the largest land animals generally.

Behold in platted mail

Behemoth rears his head. Thomson.

Behen, Ben (bê-hen, ben), n. [Per. and Ar. behen, the name of a flower.] A plant, the bladder-campion (Silene inflata). The white behen of the shops is the root of Serratula beken, a native of the Levant; red behen is the root of Stictis Limonium or sea-lavender. Called also Beken.

Behest (bê-hêst'), n. [Prefix be, and hest, A. Sax. behest, a promise, hest, a command; comp. G. geheiss, command, from heissen, to call, tell, or command.] 1. Command; precept; mandate. 'Opposition to you and your behests.' Shak. [Poetical.]

He did not pause to parley or protest.

But hastened to obey his lord's behest. Longfellow.

2.† A vow; a promise. Chaucer; Gower; Holland.

Behest (bê-hêst'), v.t. To promise.

Behete, † v.t. [A. Sax. behatan. See BEHIGHT.] As a present or infinitive this is the proper form.] To promise. Chaucer.

Behewa, † pp. Coloured. Chaucer.

Behight, † Behitet (bê-hîf'), v.t. pret. behot; pp. behight; ppr. behighting. [O. E. behete, A. Sax. behatan, to promise—prefix be, and hatan, to call, to command. In form this word is properly a preterite. See HIGHT. 'So little was this form understood in the sixteenth century that we actually find behighteth—promise, used by Backville as if from a present behight.' Dr. R. Morris.]

1. To call; to name.

In a state in which expenditure has gone beyond income; in a state in which means are not adequate to the supply of wants in arrears; as, to be behindhand in one's circumstances; you are behindhand with your payments.—2. In a backward state; not sufficiently advanced; not equally advanced with some other person or thing; as, behindhand in studies or work.

In this (dress) also the country are very much behindhand. Addison.

3. Too late.

[Rarely used before a noun. Shakspere's 'behindhand slackness' is a poetical and exceptional use.]

Behold (bê-hôld'), v.t. pret. & pp. beheld; ppr. beholding. [A. Sax. behealdan, to behold, to hold in sight, to possess, to guard—prefix be, and healdan, to hold. As to the peculiar meaning of the pp. beholden, bound, obliged, comp. D. gehouden, held bound, as also E. bound, obliged, and the phrase to hold one to his promise.] To fix the eyes upon; to look at; to see with attention; to observe with care.

When he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.

Num. xxi. 9.

Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. John i. 29.

Behold (bê-hôld'), v.i. 1. To look; to direct the eyes to an object; to view; to see: in a physical sense.

And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne, . . . stood a Lamb as it had been slain. Rev. v. 6.

2. To fix the attention upon an object; to attend; to direct or fix the mind: in this sense used chiefly in the imperative, being frequently little more than an exclamation calling attention or expressive of wonder, admiration, and the like.

Beholden (bê-hôld'n'), p. and a. [The participle of behold. See BEHOLD, v.t.] Obligated; bound in gratitude; indebted.

Bessemer's Process (bes'e-mēr's prō'sēs), n. A process for decarbonizing common cast or pig iron, which contains 8 to 8 per cent. of carbon, so as to convert it into steel, which contains $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., or into malleable iron, which is nearly pure.

This is done by passing currents of air through the cast iron in a molten state, when the carbon of the metal, combining with the oxygen of the air, is carried off as carbonic acid gas; other impurities—sulphur, phosphorus, silicon—being also oxidized and removed as gas or slag.

With the view of getting entirely rid of these impurities, which injure the steel, the process has to be continued till all the carbon also is removed, when a proper proportion of it is re-introduced by re-melting the pure metal with spiegeleisen, or some other variety of iron, rich in carbon and containing no admixture besides.

If malleable iron is wanted no carbon is re-introduced.

Bessogne. See BISOGNO.

Best (best), a. superl. [A. Sax. betest, betst, best, serving as the superl. of gōd, good. This adjective has the same superl. in the other Teutonic languages, D. and G. best, Dan. beste, Icel. bestr, Sw. bästa. The root is bat, bat, seen also in better, Goth. battista, best (see BETTER).] Most good; having good qualities or attainments in the highest degree; possessing the highest advantages; applied indifferently to physical or moral subjects; as, the best man; the best road; the best cloth; the best abilities; the best scholar; the best view of a landscape or a subject.

When he is best, he is little more than a man; and when he is worst, he is little better than a beast.

Shak.

What she wills to do or say

Seems wisest, virtuous, discreet, best. Milton.

Best, like most and many other attributes, is often used without its noun when the noun is obvious; as, men are all sinners; the best of them fall in the performance of duty.

Through, their rage and they.

The basest far into that council-hall

Where sit the best and stateliest of the land.

Tennyson.

—Best man, the bridegroom at a wedding.

I acted in the capacity of backer or best man to the bridegroom.

Dickens.

Best (best), adv. In the highest degree; beyond all other persons or things in the possession or exhibition of some good or desirable quality, in being the object of some desirable action, or in having the capacity for, or capability of being applied to, something good; as, which instrument can you best use? money is best employed in manufacture; medicine will answer best in the present case; what is expedient in best known to himself. 'Old fashions please me best.' Shak. 'Tell whom thou lovest best.' Shak. 'Speak ye, who best can.' Milton.

Much solicitous how best

He may compensate for a day of sloth. Cowper.

In one or two phrases this adverb is joined, in the sense of 'most thoroughly,' to a word expressive of a disagreeable action, as in the phrase, best abused; as, the chancellor of the exchequer is the best abused man in the country: so best hated.

Best (best), n. 1. Highest possible state of excellence; the best quality or property of a person or thing.

But you, O, you

So perfect and so peerless, are created

Of every creature's best. Shak.

2. All that one can do, or show in one's self: often used in this sense with the possessive pronouns my, thy, his, their, &c.; as, I will do my best to advance your interests; she is bent on looking her best; he did all he could to appear as his best in that performance. 'Win I shall not, but do my best to win.' Tennyson.—At best, in the utmost degree or extent applicable to the case; as, life is at best very short.—For best, finally, for good and all. 'Those constitutions . . . are now established for best, and not to be mended.' Milton.—To make the best of, to carry to the utmost perfection; to use to the best advantage; to get all that one can out of. 'Let there be freedom to carry their commodities where they can make the best of them.' Bacon. Often used in speaking of things or events that are not so good or favourable as was expected or was to be wished; as, to make the best of ill fortune or a bad bargain.—To make the best of one's way, to travel or proceed with all possible speed.

Bestadde, † Bestad, † pret. & pp. of bestead.
Bestain (bê-stân), v.t. [Prefix be, and stain.] To mark with stains; to discolour either the whole surface of a thing or in spots. 'All with blood bestain his cheeks.' Shak.

Bestead (bê-stêd), v.t. pret. bestad; pp. bestead, bestedded. [Prefix be, and stead, place.] 1. To place, or dispose, or circumstance, as to condition, convenience, benefit, and the like; to situate. 'Many far worse bestead than ourselves.' Barrow.

She smith, that she shall not be glad,
Till that she se hym so bestad. Gower.

2. † To dispose mentally; to affect. 'Sorrowfully bestadde.' Chaucer.—3. † To provide; to furnish. 'The ladie, ill of friends bestedded.' Spenser.—4. † To treat; to behave towards. Spenser.—5. † To treat; to attack.

But both atonce on both sides him bestad. Spenser.

6. † To profit; to benefit; to serve; to assist. In this ship was great store of dry Newfoundland fish, . . . the same being so new and good as it did very greatly bestead us in the whole course of our voyage. Sir F. Drake.

In the following example there may perhaps be seen the influence of the adjective steadily.

Hence, vain deluding joys,
The brood of Folly without father bred!
How little you bested!
Or fill the fixed mind with all your toys! Milton.

[This word is scarcely, if at all, used now except in such phrases as ill, well, sore bestead, in which the word is the pp.]

Bigamy (bî'ga-mî), n. [L. prefix bi, twice, two, and Gr. gamos, marriage.] The fact or state of having two wives or husbands at once. But the term is ordinarily used as synonymous with polygamy, and may be more justly defined the fact of having a plurality of wives or husbands. By the law of England bigamy is a felony, punishable, principal and accessory, with penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years, or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, not exceeding two years. In Scotland the punishment is less severe, being usually a short term of imprisonment. In the canon law bigamy was the marrying of two virgins successively, or one after the death of the first, or once marrying to a widow. This disqualified a man for orders and holding ecclesiastical offices. Shakespeare uses the word in this latter sense in Richard III. ac. iii. sc. 7.

Bigaroon (bî'ga-rôn), n. [Fr. bigarreau, from bigarrer, to streak or variegate, from L. bi, double, and varius, variegated.] The large white heart cherry.

Bile (bil), n. [Fr. bile, L. bilis, gall, bile, anger.] 1. A yellow bitter liquor, separated from the blood by the primary cells of the liver, and collected by the biliary ducts which unite to form the hepatic duct, whence it passes into the duodenum, or by the cystic duct into the gall-bladder. The most obvious use of the bile in the animal economy is to separate the chyle from the chyme. It appears also to aid in exciting the peristaltic action of the intestines. The natural colour of the faeces seems to be owing to the presence of bile. The chemical composition varies with the animal which yields it, but every kind contains two essential constituents, a resinous matter and a colouring matter called choleochrome, associated with small quantities of cholesterol, fats, salts of fatty acids, and certain mineral salts, chiefly chloride of sodium and phosphates. The greater part of the bile returns into the blood, the resinoid and colouring matters and cholesterol being the principal excrementitious substances.—2. Ill-nature; bitterness of feeling, because the bile was fancied to be the seat of ill-humour.

Nothing appears to have stirred his bile so much at Yuste as the proceedings of some members of the board of trade at Seville. Prescott.

Bile (bil), n. An inflamed tumour. See BOIL.

2. A prelate or person consecrated for the spiritual government and direction of a diocese. In England bishops are nominated by the sovereign, who, upon request of the dean and chapter for leave to elect a bishop, sends a compte d'élire, or license to elect, with a letter missive, nominating the person whom he would have chosen. The election, by the chapter, must be made within twelve days, or the sovereign has a right to appoint whom he pleases. Most of the bishops are peers of the realm. A bishop, as well as an archbishop, has his consistory court to hear ecclesiastical causes, and makes visits to the clergy, &c. He consecrates churches, ordains, admits, and institutes priests; confirms, suspends, excommunicates, grants licenses for marriage, makes probates of wills, &c.; and may grant leases for three lives, or twenty-one years, of lands usually let, reserving the accustomed yearly rents. He has his archdeacon, dean, and chapter, chancellor, and vicar-general to assist him.

—Bishops in partibus infidelium, in the R. Cath. Ch. bishops in countries where Roman Catholicism has made but little progress or has declined, and where the converts are not brought into any regular church order, who have no actual see, but are consecrated as if they had, under the fiction that they are bishops in succession to those who were the actual bishops in places where Christianity is extinct or almost so, as in Syria, Asia Minor, and the northern coast of Africa. Such titles are given for instance to missionary bishops in countries imperfectly Christianized, and were formerly given to the Roman Catholic bishops in Britain, the bishop of the northern district of Scotland up to 1878 having the title of Bishop of Nicopolis. The assumption by Roman Catholic bishops of titles borrowed from towns or districts in England gave rise in 1850 to the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill (14 and 15 Vict. cap. lx.), prohibiting the constitution of pretended provinces under a penalty of £100; but this act has been allowed to remain a dead-letter.—3. A part of a lady's dress, consisting of a pad worn on the back-part of the waist, and designed to give prominence to the skirt; a bustle.

Bismuth (bis'muth or bis'muth), n. [G. bismuth, wisemuth, O.G. wesemot.] Chemical sym. Bi. At. wt. 213; sp. gr. 9.8. A metal of a yellowish or reddish-white colour, and a lamellar texture. It is somewhat harder than lead and not malleable, when cold being so brittle as to break easily under the hammer, so as to be reducible to powder.

Its internal face or fracture exhibits large shining plates variously disposed. It fuses at 476° Fahr., and expands considerably as it hardens. It is often found in a native state, crystallized in rhombs or octahedrons, or in the form of dendrites, or thin laminae investing the ores of other metals, particularly cobalt. Bismuth is used in the composition of pewter, in the fabrication of printers' types, and in various other metallic mixtures. Eight parts of bismuth, 5 of lead, and 3 of tin, constitute the fusible metal sometimes called Newton's, from the discoverer, which melts at 202° Fahr., and may be fused over a candle in a piece of stiff paper without burning the paper. It forms the basis of a sympathetic ink; and a derivative from it is used in medicine.—Butter of bismuth, an old name for the chloride of bismuth.—Magistery of bismuth, the sublimate or basic nitrate of bismuth, which is used as a paint and as a cosmetic. Called also Pearl White, Pearl Powder.

Sax. wesend, Icel. veisund.] The name seems to mean the guide or leader of the herd, from G. weisen, Icel. visa, to show, to direct.] The name of two bovine quadrupeds, Bos or Bonassus bison being the European bison or aurochs (which see),

American Bison (Bison americanus).

Bison americanus the American bison. The latter is usually but improperly called the buffalo, the buffalo proper being a distinct species peculiar to the warmer climates of the eastern continent. The American bison is a wild animal, with short, black, rounded horns, with a great interval between their bases. On the shoulders is a large hunch, consisting of a fleshy substance. The head and hunch are covered with a long undulated fleece, of a rust-colour, divided into locks. In winter the whole body is covered in this manner; but in summer the hind part of the body is naked and wrinkled. The tail is about a foot long, naked, except a tuft of hairs at the end. The fore parts of the body are very thick and strong; the hind parts are slender and weak. These animals inhabit the interior parts of North America.

Bit (bit), n. [From the verbal stem bite (which see).] The name common to all those exchangeable boring tools for wood applied by means of the crank formed handle known as the carpenter's brace. The similar tools used for metal, and applied by the drill bow, ratchet, brace, lathe, or drilling machine, are termed drills or drill-bits. The variety is very great. For wood the typical form is the shell-bit (fig. a), which is shaped like a gauge, for shewing the three round the circumference of the hole. When large, it is termed a gauge-bit, and when small a quill-bit. Sometimes the piercing end is drawn to a radial point, and it is then known as the open-bit (recently the end is bent into a semicircular form horizontally, and it then becomes the duck snout bit. The square-bit (fig. b) is another typical form, of which there are many modifications. The end is flat, and provided with a centre-point or pin, filed triangularly, and which serves as a guide for position, a sharpened edge or nibber serving to cut the fibres round the margin of the hole, and a broad chisel-edge or cotter to pare away and remove the wood within the circle defined by the nibber. The half-round bit (fig. c) is employed for enlarging holes in metal. The rose-bit (fig. d) is cylindrical, and terminates in a truncated cone, the oblique surface of which is cut into teeth like the rose-counterbore, of which it is a modification. It is also used for enlarging holes of considerable depth in metals and hard woods.—4 The part of a key which enters the lock and acts on the bolts and tumblers.—5 The cutting blade of a plane.

The crime of blasphemy is punished by the laws of most civilized nations. In Roman Catholic countries, speaking disrespectfully of the Virgin Mary and of the saints is held to be blasphemy. — 2. Grossly irreverent or outrageous language.

That is the captain's but a choleric word,
Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy. Shak.

3. † A blasphemous person. [Rare.]

Now, blasphemy,

That swear'st grace o'er board, not an oath on shore. Shak.

Blast (blast), n. [A. Sax. blast, a puff of wind, from blæsan, to blow, cog. with Icel. blástr, Dan. blæst, a blast, a blowing; Icel. blæsa, Dan. blæse, G. blasen, to blow; from same root as E. blow. (See BLOW.) A. Sax. blæse, blæsa, a torch, a blæsa, can hardly be separate from this root.] 1. A blowing; a gust or puff of wind; or a sudden gust of wind. 'Rode that boweth downe at every blast.' Chaucer. 'Blasts that blow the poplar white.' Tennyson. — 2. The sound made by blowing a wind-instrument, as a horn or trumpet; strictly, the sound produced by one breath.

One blast upon his bugle-horn
Were worth a thousand men. Sir W. Scott.

3. Any sudden, pernicious, or destructive influence upon animals or plants; the infection of anything pestilential; a blight. 'Blasts and fogs upon thee.' Shak.

By the blast of God they perish. Job iv. 9. Of no distemper, of no blast he died, But fell like autumn fruit that mellowed long. Dryden.

4. A forcible stream of air from the mouth, from bellows, or the like; a current of air directed on a furnace by bellows or by a blowing machine, for the purpose of quickening the combustion and increasing the heat. — 5. A violent explosion of gunpowder, dynamite, or the like, in splitting rocks, &c.; the explosion of inflammable air in a mine. 6. A fatal disease in sheep. — Blast-furnace, see separate entry.

Blast (blast), v.t. 1. To injure by or as by a sudden gust or destructive wind; to cause to fade, shrivel, or wither; to check the growth of and prevent from coming to maturity and producing fruit; to blight, as trees or plants. 'Seven thin ears, and blasted with the east wind.' Gen. xli. 6. 'Blasted heath.' Shak. 'The blasted pine.' Tennyson. — 2. To blight or cause to come to nothing, as by some pernicious influence; to bring destruction or calamity upon; to ruin; as, to blast pride, hopes, reputation, happiness. 'With Hecate's ban thrice blasted.' Shak. 'Blasting the long quiet of my breast.' Tennyson.

He shows himself . . . malicious if he knows I deserve credit and yet goes out to blast it. Strlingfleet.

3. To confound or stun by a loud blast or din; to split; to burst.

Trumpeters, with brazen dia, blast you the city's ears. Shak.

4. To split by an explosion, as of gunpowder, dynamite, gun-cotton, &c. 'Blast the steep slate-quarry.' Tennyson. — 5. † To blaze abroad; to proclaim boastfully.

They blasted that the Calaisians would leave the town desolate. Hall.

Blast (blast), v.i. 1. To wither; to be blighted. Blasting in the bud, Losing his verdure, even in the prime. Shak.

2. To burst, as by an explosion; to blow up.

This project
Should have a back or second that might hold,
If this should blast in proof. Shak.

3. [Scotch.] (a) To breathe hard; to pant. (b) To smoke tobacco. (c) To boast; to speak ostentatiously; to brag. Sir W. Scott.

Blasted (blast'ed), a. Confounded; execrable; detestable: used as a milder form of imprecation than damned. 'Some of her own blasted gynaics.' Sir W. Scott.

Blastema (blas-té'ma), n. [Gr. blastēma, a shoot, growth, from blastanō, to bud.] 1. In bot. the axis of growth of an embryo; that part of the embryo comprising the radicle and plumule, with the intervening portion; also the thallus of lichens. — 2. In anat. the granular protoplasmic basis of the ovum; the proteinaceous plasma out of which an organ is formed. Owen.

Blastemal (blas-té'mal), a. Relating to blastema; rudimentary; as, blastemal formations.

Blast-engine (blast'en-jîn), n. 1. A ventilating machine used especially on ships to draw off foul air. — 2. A machine for producing a blast by compressing air for urging the fire of a furnace.

Blast (blast'ér), n. 1. One who, or that which, blasts or destroys. Beau. & Fl. — 2. An iron chisel used for boring rocks.

Blast-furnace (blast'ér-nâs), n. The name given to the common smelting-furnace used for obtaining iron from its ores with the aid of a powerful blast of air. This air-blast, which is propelled by a powerful blowing-engine, and is now invariably heated to a high temperature (800° to 900° F.), is injected by tuyeres, situated as shown at A in the annexed vertical section, in the lowest part of the furnace, near to the hearth B. (See TUYERE.) The conical part C next above the hearth is termed the boches, and the interior is continued upwards, sometimes, as in the annexed cut, in a tapered body or cone D, sometimes as a perpendicular cylinder, which is surmounted by an opening for the introduction of the materials from an external gallery F. The exterior consists of massive masonry of stone or fire-brick, the body part being lined with two shells of fire-bricks separated by a thin space to allow for expansion, which is generally filled with sand, ground fire-clay, or the like, to hinder the radiation of heat to the outside. When the body rises in the form of a perpendicular cylinder, it is called the barrel. The cone or barrel is sometimes clasped round on the outside by numerous strong iron hoops, or is cased with iron plates fastened to the masonry by iron bolts. The boches C are lined with fire-brick or fire-stone, and the hearth B is built with large blocks of refractory stone. The charging of the furnace goes on all day and night, one charge consisting of a barrow-load of coal and a barrow-load of ore, char, and lime, the last mineral acting as a flux. These charges are constantly passing downwards and undergoing a change as they come nearer the hotter parts of the furnace. Towards the lower part the earthy matter of the ore unites with the limestone and forms a slag, which finally escapes at an opening below the tuyeres, and the molten metal drops down and fills the lower part at B, to be drawn off at stated periods. This is done usually twice in the twenty-four hours by means of a round hole called a tap. The furnace is constantly kept filled to within about 2 feet of the top. The ore put in at the top takes about thirty-six hours before it comes out as iron. Hematite yields on an average about 55 per cent. of metal, and blackband about 40 to 50. In the newer forms of furnaces the top is closed and the gases formerly burned at the top are conveyed by pipes G to be utilized as fuel in heating the blast and in raising steam for the blowing-engine. The principle adopted is to close the top by a bell-and-cone arrangement H, which is opened and shut at pleasure by hydraulic or other machinery. The height of furnaces varies from 50 to 80, and even in some cases to upwards of 100 feet, and the greatest width is about one-third of this.

Blast-hearth (blast'hârth), n. The Scotch ore-hearth for reducing lead-ores.

Blast-hole (blast'hôl), n. In mining, the hole through which water enters the bottom or wind-bore of a pump.

Blockade (blök'ad), n. [From the verb to block, Fr. bloquer; comp. such words as barriers, blockade, palisade, &c.] The shutting up of a place by surrounding it with hostile troops or ships, or by posting them at all the passages, to prevent escape and hinder supplies of provisions and ammunition from entering, with a view to compel a surrender, by hunger and want, without regular attacks.
 To constitute a blockade the investing power must be able to apply its force to every point of practical access, so as to render it dangerous to attempt to enter; and there is no blockade of that port where its force cannot be brought to bear. Kent.

—To raise a blockade, to remove or break up a blockade either by withdrawing the troops or ships that keep the place blocked up, or by driving them away from their respective stations.

Blockade (blok'ad'), s. t. pret. & pp. blockaded; ppr. blockading. To subject to a blockade; to prevent ingress to or egress from by warlike means; hence, to shut up or in by obstacles of any kind; to obstruct. 'Till storm and driving ice blockade him there.' Wordsworth.

Blood (blud), n. [O E. blod, blode, blud, &c., a Sax. blod, a word common to all the Teutonic languages, Goth. blots, Icel. blót, Dan. blod, L. O. blod, D. blut, G. blut; probably seen in to blow, blow, blow, from the brightness of its colour.] 1. The fluid which circulates through the arteries and veins of the human body and that of other animals, which is essential to the preservation of life and nutrition of the tissues. This fluid is more or less red in vertebrates, except in the lowest fishes, colourless in insects, and in others of the lower animals red, bluish, greenish, or milky. The venous blood of mammals is a dark red, but in passing through the lungs it becomes oxidized and acquires a bright scarlet colour, so that the blood in the arteries is of a brighter hue than that in the veins. The specific gravity of human blood varies from 1.046 to 1.075, and its normal temperature is 98° Fahr. 1000 parts contain 735.37 of water, 5.63 albumen, 138.51 blood corpuscles, 5.16 fatty matters, 15.98 various animal matters and salts. — Blood corpuscles or globules, red and white bodies floating in the serum of blood. The red ones give colour to the blood, and are flat discs, oval in birds and reptiles, and round in man and most mammals. In man they average .00075 inch in diameter, and in the Proteus, which has them larger than any other vertebrate, .0012 inch in length and .00075 in breadth. The white or colourless corpuscles are the same as the lymph or chyle corpuscles, and are spherical or lenticular, nucleated, and granulated, and rather larger than the red globules. The colour of the red corpuscles is due to globulin and hematin. From being popularly regarded as the fluid in which more especially the life resides, as the seat of feelings, passions, hereditary qualities, &c. the word has come to be used typically, or with certain associated ideas in a number of different ways. Thus—

(a) One who inherits the blood of another, child, offspring, progeny, sometimes flesh and blood is used in this sense; as, we should prefer our own flesh and blood to strangers.

The world will say he is not Talbot's blood. Shak.

That bloody Red when noble Talbot stood. Shak.

(b) Relationship by descent from a common ancestor; consanguinity, lineage, kindred; family. 'Nearer in blood to the Spanish throne than his grandfather the emperor.' Mansel.

It is a maxim that none shall claim as heir who is not of the blood (i.e. kindred) of the purchaser. W. Harrison, Law 1.2c.

Hence—Whole blood, relationship through both father and mother, half blood, relationship through one parent only. (c) Birth; extraction, absolutely, high birth, good extraction often qualified by such adjectives as good, base, &c. 'A prince of blood, a son of Priam.' Shak. In this sense the word is often used of the pedigree of horses, hence, a bit of blood, an animal of good pedigree, a well bred animal.

She's a fine mare, and a thing of shape and blood. Colman.

Good blood was indeed held in high respect, but between good blood and the privilege of peerage there was no necessary connection. Fertile as long, and scutcheon as old, were to be found out of the House of Lords as in it. Mansel.

—The blood, the royal family or royal lineage; thus it is common to speak of princes of the blood. (d) Blood that is shed, blooded; slaughter; murder.

I will avenge the blood of Jezebel upon the house of Jehu. 1 K. 1. c.

So with the horse swinging spite, Shak.

Till blood for blood atones. Shak.

Hence, a man of blood, a murderer or blood-thirsty man; a murderer. 'The secret's man of blood.' Shak. (e) Fleshy nature, the carnal part of man as opposed to the spiritual nature or divine life. 'All frailties that besedge all kinds of blood.' Shak.

For beauty is a witch.

Against whose charms Lich methinks lies dead. Shak.

(f) Temper of mind; natural disposition; high spirit; mettle; passion; anger, in this sense often accompanied with cold or warm, or other qualifying word. Thus, to commit an act in cold blood is to do it deliberately and without sudden passion. Hot or warm blood denotes a temper inflamed or irritated, to warm or heat the blood is to excite the passions. 'Our bloods no more obey the heavens.' Shak. 'Suffice the sinews, cushion up the blood.' Shak.

Strange, unusual blood.

When man's word is in, he does too much good. Shak.

Blouse (blouz), n. [Fr.] A light loose upper garment, resembling a smock-frock, made of linen or cotton, and worn by men as a protection from dust or in place of a coat. A blue linen blouse is the common dress of French workmen. A dress of nearly the same form and of various materials is also worn by children.

Letewell was a regular democrat. He wore a blouse when he was in Paris, and looked like a workman. H. S. Edwards.

Blow (bló), n. [Connected with O.D. blauwen, to strike; D. blouwen, to beat flax; G. bleuen, to cudgel (bleuel, a beetle); Goth. bliggan, to beat; and perhaps also with blue and its allies. See BLUE.] 1. A stroke with the hand or fist, or a weapon; a thump; a bang; a thwack; a knock; hence, an act of hostility; as, to give one a blow; to strike a blow. Hence, to come to blows is to engage in combat, whether the combatants be individuals, armies, fleets, or nations.—2. A sudden calamity; a sudden or severe evil; mischief or damage received; as, the conflagration was a severe blow to the prosperity of the town.—3. At a blow, by one single action; at one effort; suddenly.

Every year they gain a victory, and a town; but if they are once defeated they lose a province at a blow. Dryden.

Blow (bló), v.t. pret. blew; pp. blown; ppr. blowing. [A. Sax. bláwan, pret. bleow, pp. bláwen, to blow, to breathe; closely allied to G. bláhen, O.H.G. plájan, to blow, also to leel. bláas, Goth. bléan, G. blasen, to blow, to blow as a wind-instrument, to E. blow, to bloom, bladder, blast, &c., and L. fo, flare, to breathe or blow.] 1. To make a current of air, as with the mouth, a bellows, &c.; to constitute or form a current of air; as, to blow with the mouth; the wind blows: often used with an indefinite it for the subject; as, it blows a gale.—2. To pant; to puff; to breathe hard or quick.

3. To give out sound by being blown, as a horn or trumpet. 'There let the pealing organ blow.' Milton.—4. To boast; to brag. [Colloq.]

You blow behind my back, but dare not say anything to my face. Bartlett.

—To blow hot and cold, to be favourable and then unfavourable; to be irresolute.—To blow over, to pass over, to pass away after the force is expended; to cease, subside, or be dissipated; as, the storm is blown over, the present disturbances will soon blow over. 'Those clouds being now happily blown over, and our sun clearly shining out again.' Sir J. Denham.—To blow up, to be broken and scattered by the explosion of gunpowder. 'Some of the enemy's magazines blew up.' Tatler.—To blow upon, (a) to bring into disfavour or discredit; to render stale, unsavoury, or worthless. 'A passage in a Latin author that is not blown upon.' Addison. 'Till the credit of the false witnesses had been blown upon.' Macaulay.

How far the very custom of hearing anything spouted withers and blows upon a fine passage may be seen in those speeches from (Shakspeare's) Henry V. which are current in the mouths of schoolboys. Lamb.

(b) To turn informer against; to inform upon; as, to blow upon an accomplice.

Blow (bló), v.t. pret. blew; pp. blown. 1. To throw or drive a current of air upon; to fan; as, to blow the fire.—2. To drive by a current of air; to impel; as, the tempest blew the ship ashore.

North-east winds blow
Sabrean odours from the spicy shore. Milton.

In the whalebone whales the blow holes form two longitudinal slits, placed side by side. In porpoises, grampuses, &c., they are united into a single crescent-shaped opening. 2. A hole in the sea to which whales and seals come to breathe. -3. Same as Blow-hole. 2.

Blowing (blō'ing), n. & a. Causing a current of wind, breathing strongly. -Blowing lands, in arid lands whose surface soil is so light as to be liable, when dry, to be blown away by the wind.

Blowing-machine (blō'ing-mā'shīn), n. See Blowing-machine.

Blowing-machine (blō'ing-mā'shīn), n. Any contrivance for supplying a current of air, as for blowing glass, smelting iron, running the air in confined spaces, and the like. This may consist of a single pair of bellows, but more generally two pairs are combined to ensure continuity of current. The most perfect blowing machines are those in which the blast is produced by the motion of pistons in a cylinder; and for smelting and refining furnaces, where a blast with a pressure of 3 or 4 lbs. to the square inch is required, blowing-engines of large size and power, worked by steam, are employed. Called also blowing-engine. See HOT-BLAST.

Blowing-off (blō'ing-of), n. In engine the process of ejecting sediment or brine from the boiler by means of a current of steam passing through the blow-off pipe (which see).

Blowing-up (blō'ing-up), n. A scolding, as, to give one a blowing-up. [Colloq.]

Blow-milk (blō'milk), n. Milk from which cream is blown off.

Blown (blōn), p. and a. 1. Swelled, inflated. 'No blown cushions deck our ornate seats.' Shak. 2. Stale, worthless, blown upon. -3. Out of breath, tired, exhausted. 'Their horses much blown.' W. Scott. -4. In servitry, having the stomach distended by gorging green food and of cattle.

Blown (blōn), p. and a. Fully expanded or opened, as a flower. 'The blown rose.' Shak.

Blow-off Pipe (blō'of pip), n. In engine a pipe at the foot of the boiler of a steam-engine, communicating with the ash-pit in land, and with the sea in marine boilers, and furnished with a cock, by opening which the steam forces the water and sediment or brine out, the operation is called blowing-off.

Blow-out (blō'out), n. A feast, an entertainment. [Colloq.]

Blow-pipe (blō'pip), n. 1. An instrument by which a current of air or gas is driven through the flame of a lamp, candle, or gas jet, and that flame directed upon a mineral substance, to fuse or vitrify it, an intense heat being created by the rapid supply of oxygen and the concentration of the flame upon a small area. In its simplest form it is merely a conical tube of brass, glass, or other substance, usually 7 inches long and 3/4 inch in diameter at one end, and tapering as to have a very small aperture at the other, within 2 inches or so of which it is bent nearly to a right angle, so that the stream of air may be directed sideways to the operator. The blow-pipe represents to some extent a more complicated, being furnished with a hollow ball for condensing the vapour of the breath, which is apt to prove injurious in the common form. It may be provided with several movable nozzles to produce flames of different sizes. The current of air is often formed by a pair of bellows instead of the human breath, the instrument being fixed in a proper frame for the purpose. The most powerful blow-pipe is the oxyhydrogen or compound blow-pipe, an instrument in which oxygen and hydrogen (in the proportions necessary to form water), propelled by hydrostatic or other pressure, and coming from separate reservoirs, are made to form a united current in a capillary orifice at the moment when they are kindled. The heat produced is such as to consume the diamond and to dissipate in vapour or in gaseous forms most known substances. The blow-pipe is used by goldsmiths and jewellers in soldering, by glass-blowers in cooling the ends of tubes, &c., and extensively by chemists and mineralogists in testing the nature and composition of substances. -2. A pipe or tube through which poisoned arrows are blown by the breath, used by South American Indians and natives of Borneo. The tube or blow-pipe is 6 to 12 feet long, with a bore scarcely large enough to admit the little finger; and the arrow is forced through by a sudden expulsion of air from the lungs (like a pee from a boy's pee-shooter), being sometimes propelled to a distance of 100 yards. Called also blow-gun.

Blow-point (blō'point), n. A kind of play among children.

Blowse (blō'se), n. Same as Blouse.

Blowth (blōth), n. [From blow, to blossom; comp. growth, from grow.] Bloom or blossom, blossom in a collective sense; the state of blossoming. [Old English and American.]

The north and south were as yet not put to rest, and in the south and north. Shak.

Blow-tube (blō'tūb), n. 1. In glass mechanics a hollow iron rod, 2 to 3 feet long, with which the blowers gather up the solid metal from the pot, to blow and form into the desired shape. -2. Same as Blow-pipe. 2.

Blow-up (blō'up), n. A quarrel, a scolding. [Colloq.]

Blow-valve (blō'valv), n. The lifting-valve of a condensing engine.

Blowy (blō'y), a. Windy; blowing. Quart. Rev.

Blowse (blō'se), n. [From the same root as blouse (which see).] A ruddy fat-faced woman, a blowy woman.

Blowse (blō'se), n. A blustering blustering man. Shak.

Blowen (blō'en), a. Blowy, ruddy and coarse-complexioned, as from exposure to weather, fat and high-coloured. 'Huge women blowen with health and wind and rain.' Tennyson.

Blowing (blō'ing), n. A blowy; scolding; stuffy. 'That blowing of wig of his.' J. Keble.

Blowzy (blō'zy), a. Ruddy faced, fat and ruddy, high coloured. 'A face made blowzy by cold and damp.' George Eliot.

Blub (blūb), v. t. [Comp. blub, blub, blubber.] To swell.

My face was blown and blub'd with angry weep. Mr. J. Keble.

Blubber (blūb'ber), n. [Also written blubber, and formerly blubber, a lengthened form of blub, blub, blub. The root is perhaps the same as that of blow, blower.] 1. A bubble. 'At his mouth a blubber globe of foam.' Chaucer. 2. The fat of whales and other large sea animals, from which train-oil is obtained. The blubber lies under the skin and over the muscular flesh. The whole quantity yielded by one whale ordinarily amounts to 20 or 30, but sometimes to 60 or more cwt. 3. A gelatinous substance, hence the name, a modum.

Blubber (blūb'ber), v. t. To weep, especially in such a manner as to swell the cheeks or disfigure the face; to burst into a fit of weeping.

Blubber (blūb'ber), n. [Comp. blub, blub, blubber.] To swell.

entirely from the vegetable and mineral kingdoms. The best blue colour for the use of painters is ultramarine, which is prepared from lapis lazuli, or azure-stone. The principal blues used in painting are these: Prussian blue, which is a compound of cyanogen and iron; blue bice, next in quality to Prussian blue; Indigo blue, from the indigo plant. Besides these there are other shades of blue, as blue-verditer, small and cobalt-blue from cobalt, lacmus or litmus, sky-blue, &c.—2. The sky; the atmosphere, from its blue tinge.

I came and sat
Below the chestnuts, when their buds
Were glistening in the breezy blue. Tennyson.

3. A term applied to a pedantic, literary female; a contraction for blue-stocking (which see).

Next to a lady I must bid adieu—
Whom some in mirth or malice call a 'blue.'

Crabbe.

4. Same as Blueing, 2.—The blues, (a) (contr. for blue-devils), low spirits; melancholy; delirium tremens. See BLUE-DEVILS. (b) The name popularly given to the regiment properly called the Royal Horse Guards, or Oxford Blues, first raised in 1661, and so called from their blue uniforms.

Blue (blü), a. 1. Of the colour of blue; sky-coloured; azure.—2. Low in spirits; having the blues or blue-devils; dumphish; put out; applied to persons; as, I feel blue. [Colloq.]

Disraeli.

3. Dismal; unpromising; applied to things; as, a blue look-out. [Colloq.]—4. [See BLUE-STOCKING.] Learned; pedantic; applied to ladies.

Some of the ladies were very blue and well informed. Thackeray.

5. In union with true, sterling; unfinishing; as, true-blue Presbyterianism. This meaning is due to the fact that the Covenanters adopted blue as their colour, in contradistinction to the royal red. From this usage blue, in combination with yellow (in memory of the house of Orange), has become the livery of the Whigs.

For his religion, it was fit
To match his learning and his wit
'Twas Presbyterian, true-blue. Hudibras.

6. Indecent; as, blue stories. [Colloq.] [Some of the words given below as compounds, with blue as the first part, are not always printed as compounds.]

Blue (blü), v. t. pret. & pp. blued; ppr. bluing. To make blue; to dye of a blue colour; to make blue by heating, as metals, &c.

Blue-bell (blü'bel), n. The popular name of two very different plants. (a) In England it is given to Scilla nutans or wild hyacinth, from the shape of its drooping flowers. (b) In Scotland it is applied to the well-known beautiful wild plant, Campanula rotundifolia, with blue bell-shaped flowers. See HAREBELL.

Blue-bird (blü'bërd), n. A small dentirostral, insessorial bird, the Erythraea, or Sialia Wilsoni, very common in the United States. The upper part of the body is blue, and the throat and breast of a dirty red. It makes its nest in the hole of a tree. The blue-bird is the harbinger of spring to the Americans; its song is cheerful, continuing with little interruption from March to October, but is most frequently heard in the serene days of the spring.

Blue-black (blü'blak), n. Ivory-black: so called from its bluish hue; a colour resembling ivory-black.

Blue-blood (blü'blud), n. Aristocratic blood; blood flowing in the veins of old and aristocratic families: a term said to have originated in Spain from a notion that the blood of some of their oldest and proudest families had never been tainted by intermixture with that of their Moorish invaders, and that it was of a bluer tint than that of the people.

The very anxiety shown by the modern Spaniard to prove that only the sangre azul, 'blue-blood,' flows through his veins, uncontaminated by any Moorish or Jewish taint, may be thought to afford some evidence of the intimacy which once existed between his forefathers and the tribes of eastern origin.

Frederick.

Blue-bonnet (blü'bon-net), n. 1. A familiar name given to the blue titmouse (Parus caeruleus). Called also Blue-cap.—2. Same as Blue-bottle, 1.—3. A name given to the soldiery of Scotland, when it was a separate kingdom, from the colour of their bonnets: generally as two words.

Boa (bó-a) n. [L., for boas, a water-serpent, from boi, boia, an ox, cow, perhaps in allusion to the size of the animal.] 1. A genus of ophidian reptiles, family Boidae, distinguished from allied families by having a prehensile tail, with a single row of scales on its under surface. It includes some of the largest species of serpents, of which a familiar example is the constrictor, sometimes 30 or 40 feet long. Though destitute of fangs and venom the boas are endowed with a degree of muscular power which renders them terrible. Once fairly involved in the crushing folds of these serpents, the strength of the most powerful man would not prove of the slightest avail. They seize sheep, deer, &c., and crush them in their folds, after which they swallow the animal whole. The species of boas are peculiar to the hot parts of South America. The boa constrictor is not one of the largest members of the genus, but the name boa or boa constrictor is often given popularly to any of the large serpents of similar habits, and so as to include the Pythons of the Old World and the Anacondas of America.—2. An article of dress for the neck, made of fur, and worn by ladies so called from its resemblance to the serpent of the same name.

Sax. bér, D. beer, O.H.G. ber, M.H.G. ber, a bear.] The male of swine not castrated.—Wild boar (Sus scrofa), an ungulate or hoofed mammal, family Suidae, the original of the hog kind. These animals are found in most parts of Europe except the British Islands, also in the greatest part of Asia, and on the Barbary coast of Africa. The wild boar differs in several respects from the tame species, its body is smaller, its snout longer, and the ears (which are always black) rounder and shorter, its color is iron-gray, inclining to black, the tusks, formed by the enlarged canine teeth, are larger than those of the tame hog, being sometimes nearly a foot in length. The chase of the wild boar is one of the most exciting sports of Europe and India. In Aor the wild boar and its head are used as a common bearing in coat of armor.

Boar (bór) v. i. In the language, to shoot out the nose, raising it as high as the ears and tossing it in the wind said of a horse.

Board (bórd) n. [A. Sax. berd, a table, a plank, a border, Icel. Dan O. berd, Goth. berd, D. board, a board, plank, (ship)board, table, border. There are also a number of closely allied forms in which, apparently by metathesis, the r comes before the vowel, as Br. berd, a flat piece of wood, a wooden lid or cover. A. Sax. brerd, a plank, a table; Dan. brerd, a chess-board, or the like; G. brerd, a board or plank. Allied probably to brerd, or to verb berd, berder, broider, belong to this stem, but have come to us through the French.] 1. A piece of timber saved thin, and of considerable length and breadth compared with the thickness. The name is usually given to pieces of timber of more than 4 inches in breadth, and of not more than 24 inches in thickness. A vessel in which anything is boiled, a large pan or vessel of iron, copper, or brass, used in distilleries, potash works, and the like, for boiling large quantities of liquor at once.—3. A strong metallic vessel, usually of wrought-iron plates riveted together, in which steam is generated for driving engines or other purposes. A steam-boiler generally consists of a fire-box, in which the combustion of the fuel occurs, and flues, through which the products of combustion pass into the chimney, together with a space containing the water and steam, the whole contained in an outer shell. Among principal varieties of boilers are—the cylinder boiler, consisting of a single iron shell; the return-flue boiler, containing flues through which heated gases return through the water-space to the chimney, and sometimes containing a fire-box inclosed by water, the multiflue or locomotive boiler, which consists of an inclosed fire-box and a large number of small flues leading to the chimney, and the water-tube boiler, which consists of an inclosed fire-box and a fire-chamber filled with small tubes through which the water circulates.—Tubular boiler, a multiflue or multitubular boiler, in distinction from a boiler with large flues.

Boiler-iron (bôil'êr-î-ern), n. A flat plate of rolled iron, of from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ inch in thickness, used for making boilers, tanks, bridges, vessels, &c.

Boiler-plate (bôil'êr-plât), n. Same as Boiler-iron.

Boilery (bôil'êr-î), n. A place and apparatus for boiling.

Boiling (bôil'ing), p. and s. 1. Raised to a state of ebullition by heat, heaving in bubbles, agitated.—2. Pertaining to a state of ebullition. Boiling point, the degree of heat at which a fluid is converted into vapour with ebullition. This point varies for different liquids, and for the same liquid at different atmospheric pressures, being higher when the pressure of the atmosphere is increased, and lower when it is diminished. When the barometer stands at 30 inches water boils at 212° of Fahr. (100° Centigrade, 80° Réaumur), and it is found that the boiling point varies 0.98 of a degree for every half inch of variation of the barometer, and consequently every tenth of an inch which the barometer rises or falls alters the boiling point of water 0.176 of a degree of Fahr.

Hence water will boil at a lower temperature, owing to diminution in the pressure, at the top of a mountain than at the bottom, and this leads us to a method of measuring the height of mountains. Water boils in vacuo at 98° of Fahr. Under additional pressure it may be raised to 400° Fahr. without boiling. Mercury boils at 662°, and hydrochloric ether at 52°, when the barometer stands at 30 inches.—Boiling springs, springs or fountains which give out water at the boiling point or at a high temperature. For long the geysers of Iceland were regarded as the most remarkable boiling springs, but these are far surpassed by those discovered in the Yellowstone Region, in the territories of Wyoming and Montana in the United States, where upwards of 1500 occur, the largest, called the Grand Geyser, forming a well 20 by 25 feet across, and having a visible depth of 100 feet. Its explosions are preceded by clouds of steam rising to the height of 500 feet, the succeeding solid mass of water ascending to the height of 90 feet.

Boilingly (bôil'ing-lî), adv. In a boiling manner.

The waves of bitumen Rise boilingly higher. Egmont

Boiboi (bôib'oi), n. [Native name.] The dog-headed box, or Xiphasma caninum, an American make, family Boide, notable for the formidable armament of teeth which line the mouth, and for the beautiful green Bold-spirited (bôl'spîr'it-ed), a. Having bold spirit or courage.

Bolt (bôl), n. [A Scandinavian word: Isol. bolt, bolt, Dan. bolt, trunk, stem of a tree. Probably from same root as bowl, badge, etc. In Is the word is pathos = bow.] 1. The body or stem of a tree.

Many trees, a thousand rings of spring in every bark.

2. A nail. 'Little long bolts or nails.' Quoted by Nares.—3. A small boat suited for a rough sea.

Bolt (bôl), n. [Fr. bol, bola, a bola, 1. bola, or bola, a kind of earth.] 1. In geol. any friable clayey shale or earth used as a pigment, generally yellow, or yellowish-red or brownish black, from the presence of iron oxide.—2. Is mineral, an amorphous earthy hydrous silicate of alumina, with iron peroxide in various proportions, and with a little magnesia when heavy or greeny. Bolt is probably an altered feldspathic or aluminous mineral. It is opaque, or slightly translucent, especially at the edges, in the red and yellow varieties. It is compact and its fracture conchoidal. It is brittle, smooth, a little unctuous, and receives a polish from the finger-nail. It adheres to the tongue, melts by degrees in the mouth, and impresses a slight sense of stringency.—Armenian bolt is of a bright red colour with a tinge of yellow, harder than the other kinds, and of a rough dusty surface.—Bolt of Stone is yellow, lighter than the other kinds, and is associated with sand.—Bohemian bolt is of a yellow colour with a coat of red, and of a flaky texture.—French bolt is of a pale red colour, variegated with specks of white and yellow.—German bolt is of a pale red colour.—Slavonian bolt is of a pale yellow colour.

These earths were formerly employed as astringent, absorbent, and tonic medicines, and they are still in repute in the East; they are also used occasionally as veterinary medicines in Europe. Armenian bolt is used as a coarctant pigment.—3. A bolt; a dice.

(He) came bolt up against the heavy dragon.

Thackeray.

Bolt (bôlt), v. t. [O Fr bolter, bolter (Mod. Fr buter), by metathesis and change of r into t, from an older form bureter, from bure, the thick woollen cloth of which bolting-sieves are made, from L. burra, coarse cloth, from L. burrus, Gr. pyrrhos, fire-coloured, yellowish-red, russet, from the usual colour of the cloth, from pyr, fire. For change of r into t compare Fr sauf with L. salvus.] 1. To sift or pass through a sieve or bolter so as to separate the coarser from the finer particles, as bran from flour; to sift out the bran, as, to bolt meal. 2. To examine or search into, as if by sifting; to sift; to examine thoroughly.

Time and nature will bolt out the truth of things.

Sir R. L. Estlin.

The report of the committee was examined and sifted and bolted to the brain. Burke.

3. To purify; to refine, as by sifting. 'Ill schooled in bolted language.' Shak.

The fanned snow

That's bolted by the northern blast twice o'er. Shak.

4. In law, to discuss or argue privately and merely for practice, as cases, by students and barristers.

Bolt (bôlt), n. A sieve. 'Boils of lawn.' B. Jonson.

Boltant, Bolting (bôlt'ant, bôlt'ing), n. In Aer terms which are applicable to the general position of hares and rabbits when crouched in coat armour, and imply springing forward.

Bolt-anger (bôlt'a-ger), n. A large auger used in ship-building to bore holes for bolts, &c.

Bolt-boat (bôlt'bôit), n. A strong boat that will endure a rough sea.

Bolt-cutter (bôlt'kut-er), n. 1. One who makes bolts. — 2. A machine or tool for cutting threads on bolts.

Boltel (bôlt'el), n. Same as Bonetail.

Boltinia (bôlt'ni-a), n. [After Dr. Bolton of Hamburg.] A sub-genus of Ascidia, or sea-squirts, a family of the group Tunicata, possessing peduncles or stalks. (See MOLUSCOPIDA.) The young grow on the stem of the parent.

Bolter (bôlt'er), n. 1. One that bolts, in any of the senses of the verb. — 2. An instrument or machine for separating bran from flour, or the coarser part of meal from the finer. 3. A kind of sifting line.

These lakes, and divers others of the fore-clad are taken with threads, and some of them with the bolter, which is a speller of a bigger size.

Rich. Carrer.

Bolter (bôlt'er), v. t. To hearse: the word seems to occur only participially, and in the Shaksperean compound blood-boltered (which see).

Bolt-head (bôlt'hed), n. A long straight necked glass vessel for chemical distillations. Called also a Matras or Receivers.

Bolting (bôlt'ing), n. Specifically, a term used in the lane of court to signify a private arguing of cases.

Bolting-cloth (bôlt'ing-kloth), n. A cloth for bolting or sifting; a linen or hair cloth, of which bolters are made for sifting meal.

Bolting-cord (bôlt'ing-kord), n. A stiff piece of rope having the strands unravelled at one extremity, used as a probang in the case of anything sticking in an animal's throat.

Bolting-house (bôlt'ing-hous), n. A house where meal is sifted.

The jade is returned as white and as powdered as if she had been at work in a bolting-house. Dennis.

Bolting-hutch (bôlt'ing-huch), n. A tub for bolting flour.

Bolting-mill (bôlt'ing-mil), n. A mill or machine for sifting meal.

Bolting-tub (bôlt'ing-tub), n. A tub to sift meal in.

Bolton. See under Bolt, n.

Boltonia (bôlt'ô-ni-a), n. [After J. B.

Bolton, an English professor of botany.] A genus of interesting North American plants, nat. order Compositæ, very closely resembling Aster.

Boltonite (bôlt'on-it), n. A mineral of a granular composition, found in Bolton, Massachusetts. It belongs to the angite series, of which it is perhaps only an altered form.

Bolt-rope (bôlt'rop), n. A rope to which the edges of sails are sewed to strengthen them. That part of it on the perpendicular side is called the leech-rope, that at the bottom the foot-rope; that at the top the head-rope.

Bolt-sprit (bôlt'sprit), n. A corruption of bowsprit.

Bolt-upright (bôlt'up-rit), n. or adv. 1. Lying flat on one's back. Chaucer. — 2. As upright or straight as an arrow or bolt; perfectly upright; erect.

The statue, erecting itself from its leaning posture, stood bolt-upright. Spectator.

Bolus (bô'lus), n. [L. bolus, a bit, a morsel, a lump, Gr. bolos, a cord, a lump.] 1. A soft round mass of anything medicinal to be swallowed at once, larger than an ordinary pill. It may be of any ingredients, made a little thicker than honey. 2. Fig. an unpalatable doctrine or argument that has to be swallowed or tolerated.

There is no help for it, the faithful proselytizer, if she cannot convince by argument, bolus into tears, and the recalcitrant finds himself at the end of the contest, taking down the bolus, saying, 'Well, well, Bolgers be it.' Thackeray.

Bom (bom), n. A large serpent found in America, of a harmless nature, and remarkable for uttering a sound like bom.

Bomb (bom), n. [Fr bombe, a bomb, from L. bombus, Gr. bombos, a hollow deep sound. These words are probably imitative, and may be therefore compared to E. boom, boon, to make a deep hollow sound.] 1. A great noise; a loud hollow sound; the stroke of a bell. 'A pillar of iron, . . . which if you had struck would make . . . a great bomb in the chamber beneath.' Bacon. — 2. A destructive projectile, consisting of a hollow ball or spherical shell, generally of cast-iron, filled with explosive materials, fired from a mortar, and usually exploded by means of a fuse or tube filled with a slow-burning compound, which is ignited by the discharge of the mortar. Bombs are discharged in such a direction as to fall into a fort, city, or enemy's camp, when they burst with great violence, and often with terrible effect, setting fire to houses, killing people, &c. The length and composition of the fuse must be calculated in such a way that the bomb shall burst the moment it arrives at the destined place. Bombs are now commonly termed Shells, though shell in the sense of a projectile has a wider meaning. See SHELL. 3. In geol. a block of scoria ejected from the crater of a volcano.

This deposit answers to the heaps of dust, sand, stones, and bombs which are shot out of modern volcanoes, it is a true ash. Giribet.

Bomb (bom), v. t. To attack with bombs, to bombard.

To Bomb the marches on secure.

To bomb the monks, and scare the ladies. Prior.

Bomb (bom), v. i. To sound.

What overcharged piece of melancholy
Is this, breaks in between my wishes thus,
With bombing sighs? B. Jonson.

Bombacæ (bom-bâ's-ê), n. pl. [From the typical genus Bombax.] A group of plants considered by some botanists as a tribe of the Sterculiaceæ, by others as a tribe of the Malvaceæ, while by others it is regarded as a separate order. They are distinguished from other Sterculiaceæ by having unilocular instead of bicellular anthers, the appearance of unilocular anthers being occasionally produced only by the fact that the anthers are sometimes united in pairs. This circumstance connects them more closely with the Malvaceæ, from which they are chiefly distinguished by having the staminal column divided at the top into from five to eight segments.

Bombard (bom'bârd), n. [Fr bombarde. The termination -ard has an augmentative force.] 1. A piece of short thick ordnance with a large mouth, formerly used, some of them carrying a ball of great weight.

Which with our bombard, shot, and basilisk,
We rest in under. Milvian.

2. An attack with bombs; bombardment. [Rare.] — 3. A barrel; a drinking vessel. 'That swain parcel of dropicals, that huge bombard of sack.' Shak. — 4. A medieval wind instrument, the precursor of the oboe, of which it was no doubt a large and coarse species. — 5. pl. Padded breeches.

Bombard (bom-bârd'), v. t. To attack with bombs, to fire shells at or into; to shell; sometimes used somewhat loosely for to assault with artillery of any kind. 'Next, she means to bombard Naples.' Burke.

Bombardical (bom-bârd'ik-al), n. Bombastic. Hood.

Bombardier (bom-bârd'êr), n. 1. A person employed in throwing bombs or shells, specifically in the English army a non-commissioned officer of the Royal Artillery, whose duty is to load shells, grenades, &c., and to fix the fuses, and who is particularly appointed to the service of mortars and howitzers. — 2. A bombardier-beetle.

Bombardier-beetle (bom-bârd'êr'hê'u), n. The common name of many coleopterous insects, family Carabidæ, and genera Brachinus and Aptinus, found under stones. They possess, when irritated in any way, a remarkable power of violently expelling from the anus a pungent, acrid fluid, accompanied by a smart report.

Bombard-man (bom-bârd-man), n. One who carried out liquor in a bombard or can. They made room for a bombard-man that brought bongs for a country lady. B. Jonson.

Bombardment (bom-bârd'ment), n. An attack with bombs or shells upon a town, fort, or other position occupied by an enemy; the act of throwing shells and shot into an enemy's town in order to destroy the buildings.

Genoa is not yet secure from a bombardment, though it is not so exposed as formerly. Addison.

Bombardon, Bombardo (bom-bârd'on, bom-bârd'ô), n. A large-sized musical instrument of the trumpet kind, in tone not unlike the ophicleide. Its compass generally is from F on the fourth ledger-line below the bass staff to the lower D of the treble staff. It is not capable of rapid execution.

Bombardon.

Bombard-phrases (bom-bârd-frâz), n. A boasting, loud-sounding, bombastic phrase. Their bombard-phrases, their foot and half foot words. B. Jonson.

Bombasin, Bombazine (bom-bâ-zên), n. [Fr bombasin, bombazine, It. bombacina, bombasin, L. bombycinus, made of silk or cotton, from Gr. bombyx, bombyx, a silkworm, silk.] A slight twilled fabric, of which the warp is silk and the weft worsted. An inferior kind is made of cotton and worsted. Spelled also Bombazine.

Bombast (bom'bâst), n. [L. bombastus, a doublet of cotton, from bombax, cotton. See BOMBASIN.] 1. Cotton; the cotton plant. 'Bombast the cotton plant growing in Asia.' E. Phillips. 'Clothes made of cotton or bombast.' Hackluyt. — 2. Cotton or other stuff of soft, loose texture used to stuff garments; padding.

Thy body's bolstered out with bombast and with bags. Gargism.

Hence—3. Fig. high-sounding words; inflated or turgid language; tustian; words too big and high-sounding for the occasion.

He (Boileau) . . . had learned to despise bombast and tinsel. Macanlay.

Bombast (bom'bast), a. High-sounding; inflated; big without meaning. 'A tall metaphor in bombast way.' Cowley.

Bombast† (bom'bast'), v.t. 1. To make inflated or bombastic.

Then strives he to bombast his feeble lines.

With far-fetched phrase.

Bp. Hall.

2. To beat; to baste.

I will so coggeil and bombaste thee that thou shalt not be able to sturte thyself.

Bombyx (bom'bīks), n. [L. Gr. bombyx, a silkworm.] A Linnean genus of lepidopterous insects, now the type of a family (Bombycidae), including many genera of moths. The caterpillar of the Bombyx mori is well known by the name of silkworm. When full grown it is 8 inches long, whitish gray, smooth, with a horn on the second last segment of the body. It feeds on the leaves of the mulberry, and spins an oval cocoon of the size of a pigeon's egg, of a close tissue, with very fine silk, usually of a yellow colour, and sometimes white. Each silk fibre is double, and is spun from a viscid substance contained in two tubular organs, ending in a spinneret at the mouth. A single fibre is often 1100 feet long. It requires 1600 worms to raise 1 lb. of silk. Greek missionaries first brought the eggs of the silkworm from China to Constantinople in the year 552. At the period of the first crusades the cultivation of silk was introduced into the Kingdom of Naples from the Morea, and several centuries afterwards into France. The silkworm undergoes a variety of changes during the short period of its life. When hatched it appears as a black worm; after it has finished its cocoon it becomes a chrysalis, and finally a perfect insect with four wings.

Bone (bón), a. [A. Sax. bōn, a bone; cog. D. and Dan. bein, Icel. and G. bein, a bone, the lower part of the leg.] 1. An integral portion of the skeleton of an animal; the substance of which the skeleton of vertebrate animals is composed; a firm hard substance of a dull white colour, composing the framework that supports the soft parts of the body. Bones give shape to the body, defend the viscera, and act as levers to the muscles. The texture varies in different bones, and in different parts of the same bone. The long bones, such as those of the arm or leg, are compact in their middle portion, and cellular or spongy at the extremities, which also have a larger diameter. They have a longitudinal cavity (the medullary canal) throughout their length containing the marrow. The flat bones are compact externally, and cellular or cancellated internally. They have no medullary canal, though their substance contains marrow. The bones in a foetus are soft and cartilaginous, but they gradually harden with age. Bones are supplied with blood-vessels, and in the foetus, or in a diseased state, are very vascular. They are also furnished with nerves and probably with absorbents. They are covered with a thin, strong membrane, called the periosteum, which, together with the bones, has very little sensibility in a sound state, but when inflamed is extremely sensitive. Bones consist of earthy or saline matters, 66.7 per cent., and animal matter, almost wholly gelatine, 33.3 per cent. The earthy matter gives them their solidity, and consists of phosphate of lime, with a small portion of carbonate of lime and phosphate of magnesia. Bones of cattle and other animals are extensively used in the arts in forming handles for knives, and for various other purposes. They are also employed as a manure for dry soils, with the very best effect, being ground to dust, bruised, or broken into small fragments in mills, or dissolved in sulphuric acid. The great utility of bones as a manure consists in the phosphate of lime they supply to the soil. —

2. A sort of hobbin made of a trotter-bone, for weaving lace. — 3. pl. Dico. [Slang or colloq.]

He felt a little odd when he first rattled the bones. Darrell.

4. pl. Pieces of bone held between the fingers of each hand, somewhat after the manner of Spanish castanets, and struck together in time to music of the negro minstrel type.

Peter rolling about in the chair like a serenader playing 'the bones.' Mayhew.

5. pl. The person in a band of negro minstrels who performs with the bones.

There were five of them—Fell was bones. Mayhew.

6. See BONE-ACE — Bone of contention, a subject of dispute and rivalry, probably from the manner in which dogs quarrel over a bone.

Sardinia was one of the chief bones of contention between Genoa and Pisa. Brougham.

— To be upon the bones of, to attack. [Rare and vulgar.]

Fuss had a month's mind to be upon the bones of him, but was not willing to pick a quarrel. Sir R. L. Estlin.

— To make no bones, to make no scruple: a metaphor taken from a dog, who greedily swallows meat, bones included. [Now only colloq.]

Perjury will easily downe with him that hath made no bones of murther. Bp. Hall.

— To have a bone to pick with one, to have an unpleasant matter to settle with him.

Bone (bón), v. t. pret. & pp. boned; ppr. boning. 1. To take out bones from the flesh, as in cookery. — 2. To put whalebone into stays. — 3. Boning, Borning (bôn'ing, born'ing), n. [From Fr. borne, O. Fr. bonne, a bound or limit, borner, to set boundaries to; whence E. bound, a limit, and bourn.] In building, &c., the act or art of making a level or plain surface by the guidance of the eye. Joiners and masons 'try up' their work by boning with two straight-edges, which determine whether the surface be twisted or a plane. Surveyors and architects perform the operation by means of poles, called boning or borning rods set up at certain distances. These are adjusted to the required line by looking along their vertical surfaces. Gardeners also employ a similar simple implement in laying out grounds, to guide them in making the surface level or of regular slope.

Bonito (bôn-êt'ô), n. [Sp.] A name of several acanthopterygious fishes, family Scomberidae. One of these is Thynnus pelamys, the striped-bellied tunny, common in tropical seas, 2½ feet long, and one of the fishes which pursue the flying-fish. It is of a steel blue colour, with whitish belly.

The bonzes live together in monasteries in a state of celibacy, somewhat after the manner of monks of the Roman Catholic Church, the laity, for whose sins they pray and de penance, supporting them by endowments and alms. There are also female bonzes, whose position is analogous to that of nuns in the Roman Catholic Church.

Booby (bô'bî), n. [Probably from root of babe, an infant; comp. also G. bube, a boy; Sp. bobo, a fool, and also the bird called the booby.] 1. A dunce; a stupid fellow; a lubber.

When blows ensue that break the arm of toll,
And rustic battle ends the boobies' broil. Crabbe.

2. A name given to one or two birds of the gannet genus (Sula), and more especially to the Sula fusca, which is apparently so stupid as to allow itself to be knocked on the head by a stick or caught by the hand. It is found in most of the warmer latitudes settled upon the islands and rocky shores, and catching fish all day for the benefit of the frigate-birds who attack and rob it. It is 2½ feet long, brown above and whitish-brown beneath. The true cause of its apparent stupidity is probably its inability to rise, on account of the shortness of its legs and great length of its wings.

Booby (bô'bî), a. Having the characteristics of a booby; after the manner of a booby.

He burned his fingers, and to cool them he applied them in his booby fashion to his mouth. Lamb.

Boon (bōm), n. A deep hollow boom, as the roar of waves or the sound of distant guns; applied also to the cry of the billows and the buzz of the beetle.

There is one in the chamber, as in the grove, for whom the boom of the wave has no sound and the march of the deep no tide. Lord Lytton.

Boonage (bōn'ij), n. Naut. a duty levied as a compensation for harbour-dues, anchorage, and soundage.

Boomerang (bōm'rang), n. A missile instrument used by the Australian aborigines, both in war and for killing game. It is of hard wood, about the size of a common running boot and the shape is a parabola. One side is flat, the other is rounded, and it is brought to a blunt edge. The boomerang is taken by one end, with the bulged side downwards, and the convex edge forward, and thrown directly onward as if to hit some object standing yards in advance. Instead of going directly forward and there falling to the earth, it slowly ascends in the air, whirling round and round, till it reaches a considerable height, when it begins to retrograde, and finally it sweeps over the head of the thrower and falls behind him. A similar instrument was known to the ancient Egyptians and Assyrians, and is represented in their sculptures.

Booming (bō'ming), n. Roaring, like waves or distant guns, crying with a hollow note; as, the booming fiftens. 'The booming billow.' Pope.

Botanically (bō-tan'ik-al-ly), adv. In a botanical manner; after the manner of a botanist; according to a system of botany; like a botanist.

Botanist (bot'an-ist), n. One skilled in botany; one versed in the knowledge of plants or vegetables, their structure, and generic and specific differences.

Then spring the living herba. . . beyond the power Of botanists to number up their tribes. Thomson.

Botanise (bot'an-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. botanized; ppr. botanizing. To study plants; to investigate the vegetable kingdom; to seek for plants with a view to study them.

Botanologist (bot'an-ol'o-jér), n. A botanist. Sir T. Browne.

Botanology (bot'an-ol'o-jī), n. [Gr. botanē, a plant, and logos, discourse.] The science of botany. Bailey.

Botanomancy (bot'an-ō-man-si), n. [Gr. botanē, a plant, and manteia, divination.] An ancient species of divination by means of plants, especially sage and fig leaves. Persons wrote their names and questions on leaves, which they exposed to the wind, and as many of the letters as remained in their places were taken up, and being joined together contained an answer to the question.

Botany (bot'a-ni), n. [As if from a form botanē, from Gr. botanē, herbage, a plant, from botēō, to feed.] The science which treats of the vegetable kingdom, dealing with the forms of plants, their structure, the nature of the tissues of which they are composed, the study of living plants and of the vital phenomena connected with them, the arrangement of plants into larger and smaller groups, according to their affinities, and the classification of these groups so as to exhibit their mutual relations and their position in the vegetable kingdom as a whole. The science further investigates the nature of the vegetation which at former epochs lived on the world, as well as the distribution of plants on the face of the earth at the present time. It is thus divided into several sections.—Structural or morphological botany, that branch of the science of botany which relates to the laws of vegetable structure or organization, internal or external, independently of the presence of a vital principle. It is also called Organography.—Physiological botany, that branch which relates to the history of vegetable life, the functions of the various organs of plants, their changes in health or disease, &c.—Descriptive botany, that branch which relates to the description and nomenclature of plants. It is also called Phytography.—Systematic botany, that branch which relates to the principles upon which plants are connected with and distinguished from each other. The system of classification now universally adopted is that proposed by Jussieu and improved and enlarged by De Candolle, Brown, and others. It is generally called the natural system, because it is intended to express, as far as we are able, the various degrees of relationships among plants as these exist in nature, and to group the various species, genera, and orders next to each other which are most alike in all respects. Several artificial systems have been proposed, as that of Tournefort, based on the leaves of the flower; but the best known is that of Linnaeus, founded on the stamens and pistils. This system, which Linnaeus himself meant to be only temporary, proved of great value to the science of botany, but it has now gone entirely out of use or is used only as a partial index to the vegetable kingdom.—Botanical geography, or the plan of distribution of plants over the globe, with an inquiry into the causes which have influenced or maintain this distribution.—Palaeontological or fossil botany embraces the study of the forms and structures of the plants found in a fossil state in the various strata of which the earth is composed.

Botany-bay Oak (bot'a-ni-bā ōk), n. Casuarina, a genus of trees, nat. order Casuarinaceae. See KEEK-WOOD.

Botany-bay Resin (bot'a-ni-bā rēzin), n. A resin which exudes spontaneously from the trunk of the grass-tree, the Xanthorrhoea arborea, nat. order Liliaceae, of Australia.

Botarga, Botarga (bō-tārgō, bō-tārg'a), n. [Sp.] A relishing sort of food, made of the roes of the mullet or tunny strongly salted after they have become putrid, much used on the coast of the Mediterranean as an incentive to drink. The best botargo comes from Tunis, is dry and reddish, and is eaten with olive-oil and lemon-juice.

Botaurus (bō-tā'rus), n. [A modern Latin word, formed from L. bos, an ox or cow, and taurus, a bull. See BITTERN.] A genus of grallatorial birds, family Ardeidae, comprising the bitterns, very closely allied to the genus Ardea or heron. See BITTERN.

Botch (boch), n. [O. E. bocche, botache, a sore, a swelling, from O. Fr. boce, a boss, a botch, a boil, a parallel form of bos; O. D. butas, a boil, a swelling. In the 2d and 3d meanings from the verb.] 1. A swelling on the skin; a large ulcerous affection.

Botches and blains must all his flesh imbosa. Milton. 2. A patch, or the part of a garment patched or mended in a clumsy manner; a part in any work bungled or ill-finished. Brahm, Brahma (bräm, brá'ma), n. In Hind. myth. the invisible, immaterial, self-existent source of all, from whom sprang the gods Brahmá, the Creator; Vishnu, the Preserver; and Siva, the Destroyer. Brahm is not properly an object of worship.

Brahmá (brá'má), n. In Indian myth. one of the deities of the Hindu trimurti or triad. He is termed the Creator, or the grandfather of gods and men; his brothers Vishnu and Siva being respectively the preserver and the destroyer. Brahmá is usually represented as a red or golden-coloured figure with four heads and four arms, and he is frequently attended by his vehicle the goose or swan. Brahmá has long since ceased to occupy the high place he once held among the gods of India, and is seldom if at all worshipped, as, since the creation of the world, he has ceased to have any functions to perform. It will not be till the tenth avatar or incarnation (when the world will undergo total annihilation) that his services will be again put into requisition.

Brahmaic (brá-má'ik), a. Brahmanic (which see).

Brahman (brá'man), n. Among the Hindus one of the sacred or sacerdotal caste, who claim to have proceeded from the mouth of Brahmá, the seat of wisdom, and to be the sole depositaries and interpreters of the Vedas. There are seven subdivisions of this caste, originating with seven penitents of high antiquity. Theoretically the Brahmanas venerated equally the three gods or persons of the Hindu trimurti or trinity, but, practically, the worship of Brahmá having fallen into desuetude, they are divided into two sects—the devotees of Vishnu and those of Siva, the former wearing an orange-coloured dress with the nama, or mark of the trident of Vishnu on the forehead, the latter being distinguished by the lingam, or emblem of the male organ of generation, and affecting greater abstemiousness. The Brahman passes through four states. He enters on the first stage at seven years of age. In it he learns to read and write, studies the Vedas, and makes himself familiar with the privileges of his caste, as his right to ask alms and to be exempted from taxes, as well as from corporal and capital punishment. The second state begins with his marriage, when regular ablutions, fasting, and many minute observances become incumbent upon him. In the third he retires to the forest, feeds upon herbs, roots, and fruits, bathes morning, noon, and evening, and subjects himself to the most rigorous penance. In the fourth state, which is that of penance, he suppresses his breath, stands upon his head, and performs other like painful ceremonies till he rises to a participation of the divine nature. Called also Brahmins.

Brahmanas (brá-mán'as), n. pl. [Skr.] The prose portions of the Vedas, which contain injunctions for the performance of sacrifices, explain their origin, and the occasions on which the mantras had to be used, by adding sometimes illustrations and legends, and sometimes mystical and philosophical speculations as well. See UPANISHAD.

Brain (bráin), n. [A Sax. brægan, brægan, D and O. Fr. bréin.] 1 That soft whitish mass, or viscus, inclosed in the cranium or skull in man and other vertebrate animals, forming the centre of the nervous system, and the seat of consciousness and volition. In it the nerves and spinal marrow terminate. It is divided above into a right and left hemisphere, and below into six lobes. It is composed of a cerebral substance, which is external, and a medullary, which is internal. From the brain proceed twelve pairs of nerves, which are distributed principally to the head and neck. That portion which occupies the superior part of the cavity of the cranium is termed the cerebrum, or brain proper, that which occupies the lower back part the cerebellum, or lesser brain, and that which lies at the base of the cranium beneath the cerebrum and cerebellum, and which is the smallest portion, the medulla oblongata, this being the upper portion of the spinal cord or spinal marrow. At the upper part of the medulla oblongata is an entrance or convex projection surrounding the posterior of the cerebrum and cerebellum, and covering the expansion of the spinal bulb towards the posterior like a bridge. This projection, called Pons Varolii, from its having been first described by Varolius, in the centre of convergence or emergence of the nervous fascicles or bundles which it seems to cover. The brain is covered by three membranes, the external membrane is termed the dura mater, the middle one the arachnoid membrane and the innermost the pia mater. According to Vasselin the human brain contains 80 parts water, 7 albumen, 4 1/2 white fatty matter, 0.70 red fatty matter, 1 1/2 caseous, 1 1/2 phosphorus, acids, salts, and sulphur, 1 1/2. Later chemists have detected a large proportion of cholesterin in the brain, and from 1 to 1 1/2 per cent phosphorus. The human brain constitutes about 1/10 of the weight of the body, in dogs it is 1/10, in the horse 1/10, in the sheep 1/10, and in the ox 1/10. In the embryo the brain is a hollow vesicle, the walls of which thicken irregularly but symmetrically on each side of the middle line, so that the cavity becomes reduced to the complex series of fissures and canals which mark its adult state.—2 The understanding, the fancy, the imagination. 'My brain is too dull.' Sir W. Scott.

 God will be worshipped and served according to his precepts word, and not according to the device of man. 1st Sam.

contrivance for retarding or arresting machinery in motion by means of friction. It generally consists of a simple or compound lever, pressing forcibly upon the periphery of a broad wheel, fixed upon one of the shafts or axes of the machine. A similar contrivance is attached to the wheels of road and railway carriages which have the motion of their wheels retarded or stopped by their pressure. Continuous brakes applied to every pair of wheels in a railway train, and worked by steam and compressed air, are now largely used in railways. The name is also used to designate a form of dynamometer, called Frémont's Friction-brake, for measuring the power yielded by water-wheels, etc.—10. An ancient instrument of torture, also called the Duke of Ezezer's Daughter.

ground. The flooring is connected with the chains by means of strong upright iron rods.

A flying-bridge is made of pontoons, light boats, hollow beams, empty casks, or the like. They are made, on occasion require, for the passage of armies. The term is also applied to a kind of ferry in which the force of the current of a river is applied to propel the boat, which is made fast in the middle of the river by a cable and an anchor, from the one side to the other. A skew bridge, or oblique bridge, is a bridge by which a road or railway is carried over an opening at some other than a right angle, so as better to maintain the continuity of the road or line. A tubular bridge is formed of a great rectangular tube, through which the roadway or railway passes. Tubular bridges are employed where the span is wide and the weight to be carried over great. The bridge over the Conway in Wales, which has a clear span of 400 feet, consists of two such tubes, formed of plate-iron rivetted upon malleableiron ribs, each weighing 1300 tons. Other well-known tubular bridges are the Britannia

Bridge over the Menai Straits, and the Victoria

Bridge over the St. Lawrence—the latter nearly 1½ mile in length, and resting on twenty-four piers, from 343 to 530 feet apart. A lattice-bridge is one constructed with cross-framing, like lattice-work, so arranged that the head of one rafter is over the bases of the two adjoining rafters. Some lattice bridges are constructed with trussed rafters, like roofs, with a king-post or hanger in the centre, others with diagonal braces united by strong pins, and without suspension-rods. These bridges are constructed both of wood and iron. Many very large wood bridges of this kind have been erected in America, that over the An- nahanna being 1½ mile long.—2. The upper part of the nose. 3. In engraving, a board

Broken-bellied (brók'n-bel'id), a. Having a ruptured belly; broken down; degenerate. 'Such is our broken-bellied age.' Sir E. Sandys. [Rare.]

Broken-hearted (brók'n-hart-ed), a. Having the spirits depressed or crushed by grief or despair.

He hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted. Is. lxi. 1.

Brokenly (brók'n-li), adv. 1. In a broken interrupted manner; without a regular series. — 2. In broken or imperfect language.

If you will love me soundly with your French heart, I will be glad to hear you confess it brokenly with your English tongue. Shak.

Brokenness (brók'n-nes), n. The state of being broken. — Brokenness of heart, the state of having the spirits crushed by grief or despair; abject mental misery. 'Helpless, hopeless, brokenness of heart.' Byron.

Nor was this submission the effect of content, but of mere stupefaction and brokenness of heart. The iron had entered into his soul. Macaulay.

Broken-wind (brók'n-wind), n. A disease in horses, often accompanied with an enlargement of the lungs and heart, which disables them for bearing fatigue. In this disease the expiration of the air from the lungs occupies double the time that the inspiration of it does; it requires also two efforts rapidly succeeding to each other, attended by a slight spasmodic action, in order fully to accomplish it. It is caused by rupture of the air-cells, and there is no known cure for it.

Broken-winded (brók'n-wind-ed), a. Having short breath or disordered respiration, as a horse.

Broker (brók'ér), n. [See BROKE.] 1. One who brokes; an agent or negotiator who is employed by merchants to make and conclude bargains for them for a fee or rate per cent., or who transacts other business for his employers. Brokers are of several kinds — Exchange-brokers, Pawn-brokers, Ship-brokers, Stock-brokers, &c. See under these headings. — 2. One who deals in second-hand household goods, clothes, and the like. 3. A pimp or procurer.

Hence broker, lackey, ignomy and shame Pursue thy life. Shak.

[Some editions read broker-lackey.]

Brokerage (brók'ér-áj), n. 1. The fee, reward, or commission given or charged for transacting business as a broker. — 2. The business or employment of a broker.

Brokerly† (brók'ér-li), a. Mean; servile. 'A brokerly slave.' B. Jonson.

Brokery† (brók'ér-i), n. The business of a broker. Marlowe.

Broking (brók'ing), a. 1. Engaged as a broker. — 2. Pertaining to the business of a broker, as a pawnbroker. 'Redeem from broking pawn the blemished crown.' Shak. Broking, † ppr. [From break, broke; with a broken voice.] Throbbing; quivering.

He singeth broking as a nightingale. Chaucer.

Broma (bró'ma), n. [Gr. brōma, food.] 1. Aliment. — 2. A chocolate preparation from the cocoa seeds or beans.

Bromal (bró'mal), n. A compound obtained by the action of bromine on alcohol. It is a colourless oily fluid, of a penetrating odour, which attacks the eyes.

Bromate (bró'mát), n. A salt formed of bromic acid.

Bromatology (bró'ma-to'l'o-jí), n. [Gr. brōma, bromatos, food, and logos, discourse.] A discourse or treatise on aliments.

Brome (bróm), n. Same as Bromine.

Brome-grass (bróm'gras), n. The name popularly given to grasses of the genus Bromus (which see).

Bromeliaceæ (bró-mé-l'i-á'-é-s), n. pl. A natural order of endogenous plants, taking its name from the genus (Bromelia, so called after a Swedish botanist, Olaus Bromel) to which the pine-apple was once incorrectly referred, and consisting of herbaceous plants remarkable for the hardness and dryness of their gray foliage. They abound in tropical America, commonly growing epiphytically on the branches of trees. With the exception of the pine-apple (Ananassa sativa) the Bromeliaceæ are of little value, but some species are cultivated in hothouses in this country for the beauty of their flowers. They can exist in dry hot air without contact with the earth, and in hothouses are often kept hung in moist mists.

Bromic (bró'mík), a. Pertaining to bromine. — Bromic acid, a compound of oxygen and bromine.

Bromide (bró'mid or bró'míd), n. A compound formed by the union of bromine with another element.

Bromine (bró'mín or bró'mín), n. [Gr. brōmos, a fetid odour.] Syn. Br. At. wt. 80. A simple non-metallic element discovered in 1826 by Balard of Montpellier. In its general chemical habitudes it much resembles chlorine and iodine, and is generally associated with them. It exists, but in very minute quantities, in sea-water, in the ashes of marine plants, in animals, and in some salt springs. It is usually extracted from bittern by the agency of chlorine. At common temperatures it is a very dark reddish liquid of a powerful and suffocating odour, and emitting red vapour. It has bleaching powers like chlorine, and is very poisonous. It combines with hydrogen to form bromic acid gas. With oxygen it forms bromic acid. Its combinations are termed bromides. Its density is about four and a half times that of water.

Bromite (bróm'it), n. See BROMITE.

Bromize (bró'míz), v. t. In photog. to prepare or treat with bromine.

Bromoform (bró'mo-form), n. [E. bromine, and L. forma, an ant.] (CHBr₃) A limpid liquid produced by bromine with caustic potash acting on wood-spirits or alcohol, analogous to chloroform, but containing bromine in place of chlorine.

Bromography (bró'mo-grá-fí), n. [Gr. brōma, food, and graphō, to write.] A term for a treatise or dissertation on food. [Rare.]

Bromus (bróm'us), n. [Gr. bromos.] A genus of grasses; the brome-grasses. Nearly 200 species have been described. Of these eight are enumerated by British botanists; they are known by having their spikelets many-flowered, two awnless glumes to each floret, two paleæ or valves, the lowermost of which has a rough, straight, rigid awn proceeding from below the tip of the valve. They are not held in much estimation by the farmer, but an Australian species, E. Schraderi, is strongly recommended as a forage plant.

Bromyrite (bró'mi-rit), n. Native bromide of silver, consisting of 87.5 parts silver and 42.5 bromine, of a yellowish-green colour, occurring at Huélot, in Brittany, in Mexico, and Chili, accompanying other ores of silver. Called sometimes Bromite.

Bronchi, pl. of bronchus (which see).

Bronchia (brong'ki-a), n. [Gr. and L.] The two tubes, with their subdivisions or ramifications, arising from the bifurcation of the trachea or wind-pipe in the lungs, and conveying air to the latter; the bronchi. See LUNG.

Bronchial (brong'ki-al), a. Belonging to the bronchi or bronchia. — The bronchial arteries are branches of the superior descending aorta accompanying the bronchia. — Bronchial glands, glands at the division of the bronchia. — Bronchial tubes, the minute ramifications of the bronchia, terminating in the bronchial cells, or air-cells of the lungs. — Bronchial membrane, the mucous membrane lining the bronchia.

Bronchic (brong'kík), a. Same as Bronchial.

Bronchitis (brong'ki-tis), n. [Gr. bronchos, the wind-pipe, and term. -itis, signifying inflammation.] In med. an inflammation of the lining membrane of the bronchia, or tubes which convey air to the lungs; a complaint of very frequent occurrence. It is of two kinds, acute and chronic. It is also a very serious disease among quadrupeds.

Bronchocoele (brong'ko-ell), n. [Gr. bronche, the wind pipe, and cèle, a tumour.] Same as Coele.

Bronchophony (brong'kaf'o-ni), n. [Gr. bronche, the wind pipe, and phōnē, voice.] In med. a loud, clear, thrilling sound, coming as if close to the ear of the hearer when applied to the patient's chest, or as if the patient spoke through his ribs.

Bronchotomy (brong'ku-tō-mi), n. In surg. a kind of incision, with a blunt and rounded point used in the operation of bronchotomy.

Bronchotomy (brong'kot'o-mi), n. [Gr. bronche, the wind pipe, and tomē, a cutting.] In surg. an incision into the wind pipe or larynx between the rings, to afford a passage for the air into and out of the lungs when any disease prevents respiration in the usual way or to extract foreign bodies which have got into the trachea, or in cases of suffocation, drowning, &c. The operation is called bronchotomy when the opening is made into the trachea, and laryngotomy when made into the larynx.

Bronchus (brong'zū), n. pl. Bronchi (brong'ki). [Gr. bronchos, the wind pipe.] One of the bifurcations of the trachea. See TRACHEA, LENS.

Brond (brond), n. A brand; a sword.

Brontium (bron'ti-um), n. [Gr. brontion, from brōnē, thunder.] In ancient Greek theatre, a brazen vessel used for imitating thunder by rolling stones in it.

Brontolith (bron'to-lith), n. [Gr. brōnē, thunder, and lithos, a stone.] An aerolite, meteorite.

Brontology (bron-to-lo-jī), n. [Gr. brōnē, thunder and logos, discourse.] A discourse or dissertation upon thunder.

Brontosaurus (bron-to-sō'm), n. [Gr. brōntēs, a giant, and saur, a living creature.] A name given to the animal producing certain gigantic bird like footprints, some being 30 inches long, occurring in the new red sandstone of Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Brone (brōn), n. [Fr. brone, from It. brona, brone, allied to bruno, brund, &c., being from Teut. root brun, to burn.] 1. A compound or alloy of from 2 to 20 parts of copper to 1 of tin, to which other metallic substances are sometimes added, especially zinc. It is brittle, hard, and sonorous, and used for statues, bells, and cannon, the proportions of the respective ingredients being varied to suit the particular purposes. Ancient brone generally contains 4 to 12 per cent. of tin. The alloy of our present brone statue consists of 94 parts of copper, 5 of tin, and 1 of zinc. — 2. Any statue or bust, urn, medal, or other work of art, cast of brone, whether original or a copy of an antique. — 3. A priest, a brone, a flower, a root. — 4. A brown colour resembling brone, a pigment prepared for the purpose of imitating brone, of two kinds, the yellow and the red. The yellow is made of fine copper dust, the red of copper dust with a little pulverized red ochre. — 5. Beldnam, impudens, brone.

Imbrowned with antique brone, in. Hendry stands.

Tuning his voice and balancing his hands. Page

— Imitation brone, brone, prince's medal, or Manassah gold, terms applied to alloys of zinc and copper, containing 80 per cent. or more of copper. From zinc being cheaper than tin, these alloys are much used instead of true brone for ornaments, which are gilt or artificially bronzed over the surface. These terms are also applied to alloys of copper with zinc, tin, and lead. An alloy of about 86 parts copper, 11 zinc, and 3 tin, is used for statues.

Brone (brōn), v. t. pret. & pp. broned; pp. bruning. 1. To make brown or of the colour of brone, as by exposure to the sun.

Stained with an ancient sword-cut on the shield.

And broned and broned. Templeton

Broneficially — 1. To make anything resemble brone by means of copper dust, or leaf fastened on the outside, as gold leaf in gilding. — 2. To harden or make like brone, hence, to make hard or unfeeling. — The lawyer who brones his bosom instead of his forehead. See W. Scott — Brone age is evolved the age between the stone age and the iron age (See AGE). In the brone age the implements were of copper or brone, the dwellings were burned, and their ashes deposited in urns or stone-chests, covered with central mounds of earth or cairns of stones. Gold and amber ornaments appear in this age, but never silver.

Bronzed-skin Disease. Same as Addison's Disease.

Bronze-liquor (brong'lik-er), n. A solution of chloride of antimony and sulphate of copper used for bronzing gun barrels, &c.

Bronze-powder (brong'pou-der), n. A metallic powder, mixed with oil paint, for colouring objects in imitation of brone. The yellow is composed of pulverized brass and the red of pulverized copper.

Bronze-steel (brong'stēl), n. The name given to brone condensed and hardened by a method which has been adopted in the making of cannon. The piece is first cast in brone in the ordinary way, and its bore is afterwards widened by forcing in several strong steel cylinders in succession. When so treated the brone next the bore is said to acquire a tenacity approaching that of cast-steel.

Bronze-wing (brong'wing), n. A name for certain species of Australian pigeons, chiefly of the genus Phaps, distinguished by the brone colour of their plumage. The common brone-winged ground-dove (P. obscura) abounds in all the Australian colonies, and is a plump bird, often weighing a pound, much esteemed for table.

Bronzing (brong'zī), n. Resembling brone; brone-coloured.

Bronzist (brong'ist), n. One who casts brones or lacquers metals, planter-figures, &c., to give them the appearance of brone.

Bronzite (brong'zī), n. A mineral, a variety of diasilite, nearly allied to Labrador hornblende or hypersthene. It has a yellowish brown colour, and semi-metallic lustre approaching to that of brone. It is a silicate of magnesia and iron.

Bronzy (brong'zī), n. Resembling brone; as, a bronzey appearance.

Broo, n. See HAIR.

Broo (brō), n. Broo (Scottish). — Nas broo, no favourable opinion. — An ill broo, an unfavourable opinion.

But this ridings and mappanhangings, my laddy,

I have no broo of them aw. Ed. W. Scott

Brooch (brōch), n. [A form of broach (which see), the present is the commoner spelling of the word in this sense.] 1. An ornamental pin or clasp used for fastening the dress or merely for display. It is now worn mostly by women, and on the breast, but formerly brooches were also worn by men, and on the cap or hat. A large circular brooch, generally made of silver, and set with a stone, such as a cat's paw, is one of the almost indispensable ornaments of a Highland costume. — With broocher and siglets of gold upon their caps. Ralph Robinson.

Honour's a good brooch to wear in a man's hat at all times. J. Tennyson

2. In painting, a painting of one colour.

Brooch (brōch), v. t. To adorn with or as with a brooch or brooches. (Rare.)

Not the importance thou

Of the full-fledged Ceres over shall Be brunched with me. Shak.

Brood (brōd), n. [A Sax. brōd, a brood; D. broed, G. brut, a brood; from root of breed.] 1. Offspring, progeny.

The two stars and glens his heavy brood. Wordsworth

2. A hatch, the young birds hatched at once; as, a brood of chickens or of ducks. — 3. That which is bred, species generated, that which is produced, sort, kind.

Have you forgotten Libya's burning wastes,

Its tainted air, and all its broods of poison? Addison

4. In mining, any heterogeneous mixture among tin or copper ore, as manila, black-jack, &c. — To sit on brood, to ponder. Shak.

Brood (brōd), v. t. (From the noun, comp. D. bruden, G. brüten, to hatch.) 1. To sit upon eggs, as a hen, for the purpose of warming them and hatching chickens, to sit over and cover young ones, as a hen over her chickens to warm and protect them, hence, to remain steadily settled.

Those from the first

Went forward, and with mighty wings outspread,

Dove-like sat in brooding on the vast abyss. Milton

Revered darkness brooded a or the deep. See W. Scott

2. To remain a long time in anxiety or solicitude thought, to have the mind dwelling for a long time uninterceptedly on a subject with an error. — Encouraged in themselves, by reading and meditation, a disposition to brood over their wrongs. Montaigne

Brood (brōd), v. t. 1. To sit over, cover, and cherish, as, a hen broods her chickens; hence, to nourish.

The sturdy earth that brought out

And brooded up her brood. Farmer

2. To cherish with care. — See how he broods the boy. Bacon, & Pl. — He nor broods his brooded stores. Gray

You'll sit and brood your sorrow on a throne.

Dryden

3. To plan or mature with care. — To brood was. Bacon

Brooding (brōd'ing), n. 1. Sitting, as a hen on her eggs; as, a brooding hen. — 2. Warning. — The brooding heat. Templeton — 3. Pondering; thinking deeply on, disposed to ponder or think deeply on, as, a brooding disposition. — 4. Settled, rooted, fixed in the heart, a figurative use derived from the steadfastness with which a hen sits on her eggs. — A brooding and unwarmed hostility. Milton Brood-mare (brōd'mār), n. A mare kept for breeding.

Broody (brōd'i), n. In a state of sitting on eggs for hatching, inclined to sit. (Rare.)

The common hen, all the while she is broody, she and leads her chickens, and runs a voice which we call clucking. Ray

Brook (brūk), n. [A Sax. brēa, a spring, a brook, from brōm, to burst forth, D. brak, a marsh, a pool, G. brach, a marsh. A brook is therefore a breaking forth of water, comp. spring.] A small natural stream of water, or a current flowing from a spring or fountain less than a river.

Spring makes little rivulets, these united make brooks, and these coming together make rivers, which empty themselves into the sea. Locke Brook (brūk), v. t. [A Sax. brōdan, to use, employ, or perform, to eat or chew; D. gebruden, loaf, brook, Goth. brukan, to use, of cognate origin with L. frui, to enjoy.] 1. To bear, to endure, to support, as, young men cannot brook restraint.

Still on, who could not brood one inch, crouch to the wicked son? Montaigne wedding-feast was held, so as to be first at the brow or other eatables, the term being identical with brow.

Browse (brôz), v. i. To browse. 'Such like sort of fruit, which those animals browz'd upon.' Oldys.

Brora-beds (brô-ra-bêdz), n. pl. In geol. a series of strata occurring near Brora, Sutherlandshire, of the age of the lower oolite, remarkable for containing a seam of good coal 3½ feet thick, which is the thickest bed of true coal found in the secondary strata of Britain.

Brose (brôz), n. [Gael. brothas, brose; same root as brew, broth, &c.] A Scotch dish, made by pouring boiling water, boiling milk, the liquor in which meat has been boiled, or the like, on oatmeal, barley-meal, or other meal, and immediately mixing the ingredients by stirring. Sometimes butter is added to the meal, and when the brose is made with water sweet milk is generally added. The dish is denominated from the nature of the liquid; as, kail-brose, water-brose, beef-brose, &c.—Athole-brose is a somewhat different dish.

Brosen, † Brosten (brôsn), pp. Burst.
Brosimum (brô-si-mum), n. A genus of Artocarpaceae, one species of which (B. Galactodendron) is the cow-tree of South America. B. Alicastrum (the bread-nut tree), common in the woods of Jamaica, produces nuts which, when roasted, are used as bread, and taste like hazel-nuts. The wood resembles mahogany, and is sometimes used by cabinet-makers. The leaves and young branches form a most useful fattening fodder for cattle. The snake or leopard wood, used as veneers and for walking-canes, is yielded by a species (B. Aubletii) from British Guiana.

Brosimius (brô-si-mi-us), n. A genus of fishes belonging to the cod family (Gadidae). One species has been found on our northern coasts, commonly called the torsk or tusk.

Brotnay (brô-ta-ni), n. [L. abrotanum.] Southernwood.

Broth (broth), n. [A. Sax. broth, Icel. broth; from root of brew.] Liquor in which flesh is boiled and macerated, usually with certain vegetables to give it a better relish. In Scotland the name is seldom applied unless pot barley forms one of the ingredients.

Good broth, with good keeping, do much now and then;
Good diet, with wisdom, best comforteth men.

Tusser.

Brothel (broth'el), n. [Usually regarded as another form of bordel (which see), but Skeat shows that this is probably a mistake, brothel being originally a person. He derives brothel, as well as a parallel form, O.E. brethel, a wretch, from same root as A. Sax. brothron, degenerate, base, viz. from root brut, to break, as in E. brutle, though he admits that there was early a confusion between brothel and bordel.] A house of lewdness; a house appropriated to the purposes of prostitution; a bawdy-house; a stew.

Make it more like a tavern or a brothel
Than a graced palace. Shak.

Brothell (broth'el), v. i. To haunt brothels.

Brothel-house (broth'el-hous), n. A brothel.

From its old ruins brothel-houses rise,
Scenes of lewd loves and of polluted joys. Dryden.

Brotheller (broth'el-er), n. One that frequents brothels. 'Gamblers, jockies, brothellers impure.' Cowper.

Brothelry (broth'el-ri), n. 1. A brothel.—2. Lewdness; obscenity. 'Loathsome brothelry.' Bp. Hall.

Brother (bruh'ér), n. pl. Brothers (bruh'ér-ers) or Brethren (brêth'ren). [A. Sax. brothor; a word widely spread through the Indo-European stock—D. broeder, Icel. bróðir, Dan. and Sw. broder, Goth. brothar, G. bruder, Ir. and Gael. brathair, W. bradur, Rus. brat', Bohem. bratr, L. frater, Gr. phrater, Skr. bhratr, brother, believed to be ultimately from root bhar, in E. to bear.] 1. A human male born of the same father and mother. A male by one of the parents only is called a half-brother or brother of the half-blood. In Scrip. the term brother is applied to a kinsman by blood more remote than a son of the same parents, as in the case of Jacob and his uncle Laban. Gen. xxix. 12. The word may also be used of the lower animals, and is even used of plants.

It was then removed and planted in a remote place close to a brother long-style plant. Darwin.

2. Any one closely united, as by a common interest; an associate; one of the same rank, profession, or occupation; or more generally, a fellow-creature.

We few, we happy few, we band of brothers;
For he, to-day that sheds his blood with me,
Shall be my brother. Shak.

Specifically, a member of a religious order.

Going to find a barefoot brother out.
One of our order. Shak.

3. One that resembles another in manners or disposition.

He also that is slothful in his work is brother to him that is a great waster. Prov. xviii. 9.

[The plural form brethren is not now used in the sense of male children of the same parents, but only in the wider meanings of the word brother.]

Brother-german (bruh'ér-jér-man), n. [Brother, and L. germanus, full-brother. See GERMAN, sprung from the same father and mother.] A brother by both father and mother's side; a full-brother.

Brotherhood (bruh'ér-hud), n. [Brother, and term. -hood.] 1. The fact of being a brother.

My brother slew so man; his fault was thought,
And yet his punishment was cruel death.
Who sued to me for him?
Who spake of brotherhood? Shak.

2. The quality of being brotherly. 'And friendship shall combine, and brotherhood.' Shak.—3. An association of men for any purpose, as a society of monks; a fraternity.

'There was a fraternity of men-at-arms, called the brotherhood of St. George.' Sir J. Davies.—4. A class of individuals of the same kind, profession, or occupation. 'The brotherhood of Christendom. Burke. 'A brotherhood of venerable trees.' Wordsworth.

Brother-in-law (bruh'ér-in-lâ), n. The brother of a husband or wife; also, a sister's husband.

Brotherless (bruh'ér-less), a. Without a brother.

Brotherlike (bruh'ér-lik), a. Becoming a brother. Shak.

Brotherliness (bruh'ér-li-nes), n. State of being brotherly.

Brotherly-love (bruh'ér-luv), n. Brotherly affection. Shak.

Brotherly (bruh'ér-li), a. Pertaining to brothers; such as is natural for brothers; becoming brothers; kind; affectionate; as, brotherly love.

Brotherly (bruh'ér-li), adv. After the manner of a brother; kindly; affectionately. 'I love thee brotherly.' Shak.

Brother-uterine (bruh'ér-û-tér-in), n. A brother by the mother's side only.

Brouded, † pp. [Fr. brodê.] Embroidered. Chaucer.

Brouette (brô-et'), n. [Fr.] A small two-wheeled carriage.

Brougham (brô'am or brôm), n. [After the first Lord Brougham.] A one-horse close carriage, either two or four wheeled, and adapted to carry either two or four persons.

Brought (brât), pret. & pp. of bring.

Brouken, † v. t. [See BROOK, v. t.] To enjoy; to use. 'So mote I brouken wel min eyen tway.' Chaucer.

Broussonetia (brô-on-ê-shi-a), n. [After M. Broussonet, a French naturalist.] A genus of trees, nat. order Moraceae. B. papyrifera, or paper-mulberry, is cultivated in China and Japan for the sake of its young shoots, which are made into baskets. Its outer bark is the chief paper-making material in China and Japan, and cloth is made from the inner bark.

Brouse (brôuz). Same as Browse.

Brow (brôu), n. [A. Sax. brâ, bræw, the eyebrow; D. brauw (only in compound wenkbrauw, the eyebrow, lit. wink-brow); Icel. brân, the eyebrow, brâ, the eyelid; G. braue, augenbraue, the eyebrow; the same word is seen also in Gr. ophrys, Per. abru, Skr. bhrâ, the eyebrow.] 1. The prominent ridge over the eye, forming an arch above the orbit. The skin of this arch or ridge is moved by muscles, which contract it in a frown and elevate it in joy or surprise; hence, to knit the brows is to frown. 2. The arch of hair over the eye; the eyebrow. 'Your inkly brows, your black alk hair.' Shak.—3. The forehead.

Beads of sweat have stood upon thy brow. Shak.

4. The general air of the countenance. 'To whom thus Satan with contemptuous brow.' Milton.—5. The edge of a steep place; the upper portion of a slope. 'The brow of the hill.' Luke iv. 29.—6. A fringe of coppice adjoining the hedge of a field.—7. The gallery in a coal-mine which is cut across the face of the coal.—8. Naut. An inclined plane of planks on one or each side of a ship, to communicate with the inside; a gangway for the accommodation of the shipwrights in conveying timber, &c., on board.—Nas brow, an ill brow. See under BROO.

Brow (brôu), v. t. To form a brow or elevated border to. [Rare.]

Tending my flocks hard by i' th' hilly crofts,

Buddha (bud'da), n. (Gr. buddha, wise, from buddhā, to know.) The Wise or the Enlightened, the sacred name of the founder of Buddhism, who appears to have lived in the sixth century B.C. His religion formed a system opposed to the prevailing Brahmanism. See Buddhism.

Buddha, from a Summer Dream.

Buddhism (bud'dizm), n. The religious system founded by Buddha, one of the most prominent doctrines of which is that no sin, or an absolute release from sin, is the chief good. According to it pain is inseparable from existence, and consequently pain can come only through no sin, and in order to attain nirvana, our desires and passions must be suppressed, the most extreme self-renunciation practiced, and we must, as far as possible, forget our own personality. From Buddhism involving a protest against caste distinctions it was eagerly adopted by the Dravids or non-Aryan inhabitants of Hindustan. It was pure moral and humane in its origin, but it came subsequently to be mixed up with idolatrous worship of its founder and other deities. Although now long banished from Hindustan by the persecutions of the Brahmins, Buddhism prevails in Ceylon, Java, Ceylon, China, Tibet, Mongolia, Tartary, China, and Japan, and its adherents are said to comprise about a third of the human race.

Buddhist (bud'dist), n. A worshipper of Buddha, one who adheres to the system of Buddhism.

Buddhist, Buddhistic (bud'dist, bud'tizm), n. Relating to Buddha or to Buddhism.

Buddhist architecture, the oldest and only true native style of Indian architectural architecture, the earliest specimens dating to the B.C. The objects of Buddhist art may be divided into five groups: (a) Stupas or mounds, bearing inscriptions on their shafts, with emblematic or animal on their capitals. (b) Stupas or towers, a great number of which were built in the form of large domes, some in the form of hemispheres, others partly cylindrical and furnished with either a flat circle or pointed terminals like a dome at the top. These towers are supposed to have been erected at first to commemorate some event, or to show that the place was sacred, but afterwards they were employed to contain relics of the Buddha or of some noted saint. Where there are relics the tower is called a dagoba, or relic shrine. (c) Stupa, consisting of elaborately sculptured pillars, found surrounding stupas, sacred trees, temples, pillars, and other objects. (d) Chaitya, churches or assembly halls, vast chambers cut out of the living rock, and corresponding in almost every respect with the churches of the Christian religion. Their plans, the position of the altar or relic water, the stupa, the open and other particularities, are the same in both. (e) Vihara, or monasteries, also excavated from the solid rock, supported by pillars of the natural rock left in their places, and surrounded by a number of small sleeping places or cells. One leading characteristic of the Buddhist style is a variety of arch, formed by each layer of stones overlapping that below it till the two sides approach so closely that the aperture at the top can be covered by a single stone or architrave.

Buddhist architecture prevails also in Ceylon, Tibet, Java, and generally wherever this faith still maintains its influence.

Budding (bud'ding), n. 1. Producing buds, as, a budding tree. 2. Being in the condition of a bud, as, being in an early stage of with too much curiosity; impatiently; effusively. Dryden.

Business (bis'nēs), n. [This word can hardly be unconnected with busy, and yet it is not an ordinary abstract noun derived from the adjective, for it seems never to have the meaning of state of being busy, busy-ness.
Probably the O. Fr. business, business, affairs, business (Fr. business, work, affair), was supposed to be connected with the ll.
adjective busy, and influenced at least the meaning of the word.] 1 A matter or affair that engages a person's time, care, and attention whether for a longer or shorter period, an affair requiring or requiring attention, specifically, that which binds or occupies one's time, attention, and labor as his chief concern, that which one does for a livelihood, occupation, employment, as, his business was that of a merchant, to carry on the business of agriculture.

They were far from the Eden, and had no business with any man. Jed. with.

Bus (bus), n. [A word of somewhat doubtful origin, but apparently the same as G. bus, Sw. busa, a kiss, comp. also lr and Geel, bus, a mouth, a lip.] A kiss, a salute with the lips. —Then don't give me kissing business. Shak. [Familiar.]

Bus (bus), v. t. [O. and Prov. O. busa, Sw. busa, to kiss. See the noun.] To kiss, to salute with the lips. —And bus thine as thy wife. Shak. —Her burnt by 4 to 5 feet in breadth. These are used by the Indians for thatch, for which they are admirably adapted.

Their value acting as rafters to carry off the rain. The spathes are used as legs, or when cut longitudinally and stretched out they form a canopy but strong kind of cloth.

Busm (busm), n. [Fr. busm, ll. busm, busm, ll. busm, from busm, a small boat, ll. busm. See Bus.]

1 In crisis, the figure of a person in relief, showing only the hand, shoulder, and breast. —2 The chest or thorax; the trunk of the human body.

It seemed upon a hard but glowing face
Which bore as if there was a warm heart under.

Byron.

Busard (bus'ard), n. [O. Fr. busard, a peacock corruption of ll. bus arde, ll.
slow bird, comp. Sp. busarda, crucarda.]
A bird of the genus Ola, belonging to the order Carnivores, but approaching the vulture.

The great busard (Ola tarda) is the largest European bird, the male often weighing 30 lbs., with a breadth of wing of 6 or 7 feet. The busard is now rare in Britain, but abounds in the south and east of Europe and the steppes of Tartary, feeding on green earth and other vegetable, and on earth-worms.

Busard (Ola tarda).

bustling. [From root of busy, same word as look, bustle, to bustle, to splash in water; bustle, bustle, a splash, comp. O. E. bustle, bustle, which is evidently of same origin if not a mere modification.] To display activity with a certain amount of noise or agitation; to be active and stirring, to be very quick in motion. —And leave the world for me to bustle in. Shak.

Bustle (bus'l), n. Activity with noise and agitation, stir, hurry-scurry; tumult, disturbance. —A strange bustle and disturbance in the world. Scott.

byg, byg, byg, byg, byg, byg, byg, byg, further affinities doubtful. The old spelling with i instead of y had better have been retained.] 1 Employed with constant attention; engaged about something that renders interruption inconvenient.

My mistress needs you wed
That she is busy, and she can not come. Shak.

2 Actively employed, occupied without cessation; constantly in motion. —They hammer closing rivets up. Shak. —The music-stirring motion of soft and busy feet.
Shelley. —3 Active in that which does not concern the person, meddling with or prying into the affairs of others, officious, importunate, hence, troublesome, vexatious. —On person, one who officiously concerns himself with the affairs of others. —A busy- body who had been properly punished for running into danger without any call of duty. Macaulay.

Busybodyism (bi'si-bo-di-izm), n. The habit of busying one's self about other people's affairs.

The most common effect of this much evangelical spirit, especially with young women, is self-satisfaction and busybodyism. Clarendon.

But (bat), adv. Originally a prop. and still often to be so regarded, though also as adv. and frequently a conj., in many cases its character is ambiguous. [A Sax. bātan, bātan, without, out of, unless—ba, by, and ātan, ātan, without, like O. Sax. bātan, D. bātan, ex- cept.] 1 Without, as, A Sax. bātan ex- cept, without, Of known fact, but fact (that is without fact or equal). —Denham —Touch not a cat but a glove a Scotch proverbial saying. —2 Except; besides; unless.

Who can it be, ye gods, but perjured Lyons.
Ed. Scott.

The wedding guest he beat his breast,
Yet he cannot choose but hast. Coleridge.

For less than this is shocking in a man
Most wretched, but from strains of mental agony.
And uncreated but for love divine. Yates.

In this sense but is very common after all and cannot. (See under All and Can.) In Old English if was often used pleonastically after but in this sense.

*But if I have my will
For dreme love of thee, leman, I spille.* Chaucer.
3. Excepting or excluding the fact that; save that; were it not that; unless.

And, but infirmity,
Which waits upon worn times, hath something seized
His wish'd ability, he had himself
The lands and waters 'twixt your throne and his Measured to look upon you. Shaks.

Last year, my love, it was my hap,
Behind a grenadier to be,
And, but he wore a hairy cap,
No taller man methinks than me. Thackeray.

Often followed by that.

Here we live in an old crumbling mansion that looks for all the world like an inn, but that we never see company. Goldsmith.

4. Only; merely; simply; as, there is but one man present.

If they kill us we shall but die. z Kil. vi. 4.
I am, my lord, but as my betters are
That led me hither. Shaks.

[A negative has been omitted in such phrases.
Chaucer would have said, 'There was (i.e. is not) but one man present.]-5. Equivalent to a relative with a negative; who, which, etc., . . . not.

No voice except; no voice but well could join Melodious part. Milton.

Here 'no voice but well could join' is equivalent to 'no voice which could not well join.'

6. Otherwise than that; that . . . not. In this sense (a) after negative clauses.

I see not then but we should enjoy the same license.

It cannot be but nature hath some director of infinite power to guide her in all her ways. Hooker.

Believe not but I joy to see thee safe. Rowe.

The negative clause is often represented by the single word not.

Not but they thought me worth a ransom. Hudibras.

Often followed by that.

I was not so young when my father died but that I perfectly remember him. Byron.

Sometimes what follows, but this is considered ungrammatical.

Not but what I hold it our duty never to foster into a passion what we must rather submit to as an awful necessity. Lord Lytton.

(b) In interrogative sentences implying a negative answer.

Who knows but we may make an agreeable and permanent acquaintance with this interesting family?

(c) After such expressions as God forbid.

God defend but still I should stand so. Shaks.

7. But and but that are used in a peculiar manner after phrases expressing absence of doubt.

I doubt not but I shall find them. Shaks.

There is no question but the King of Spain will reform most of the abuses. Addison.

My lord, I neither can nor will deny
But that I know them. Shaks.

[The but in this case may be the adversative conjunction as in 9.]-8. For than.

I no sooner saw my face in it but I was startled at my shortness in it. Addison.

[This usage is not obsolete, but is now considered ungrammatical.]-9. [In the following usages but is clearly an adversative conjunction.] On the contrary; on the other hand; yet; still; however; nevertheless. [In this use but notes an addition to supply what is wanting to elucidate or modify the sense of the preceding part of a sentence or of a discourse, or to continue the discourse, or to exhibit a contrast.]

Now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity. i Cor. xiii. 13.

When pride cometh, then cometh shame; but with the lowly is wisdom. Prov. xi. 2.

[The adversative force of this conjunction often refers to an unexpressed thought, and not to the clause or sentence preceding.

Of much less value is my company than your good words. But who comes here? Shaks.

Have you got nothing for me?—Yes, but I have.

But often also follows an exclamation of surprise, admiration, terror, or any strong feeling, and introduces a clause expressing the ground of the feeling.

Good heavens, but she is handsome! Adam Smith.

—But and if, but if.

But and if we have this livery, if we wear his cognizance here in this world, that is, if we love our neighbour, help him in his distress, be charitable, loving and friendly unto him, then we shall be known at the last day. Latimer.

Butt (but), n. [Partly from O.Fr. bot, Fr.
bout, the end or extremity of a thing, partly from O.Fr. bot, Fr. but, an end, aim, or goal, and partly from Fr. butte, a butt used in shooting, all these words being from an older verb (boter, to push, thrust, strike) derived from M.H.G. bôzen, to strike, to beat, a word cognate with E. beat.] 1. The end or extremity of a thing, particularly, the larger end of a thing, as of a piece of timber or of a fallen tree; the thick end of a musket, fishing-rod, whip-handle, &c.—

Cadis (ka'dis), n. [See CADIS.] A French term for a coarse woollen serge.

Cadji Gum (ka'jé-l gum), n. See ANACARDIUM.

Cadmean, Cadmian (kad-mé'an, kad'mi-an), a. Relating to Cadmus, a legendary prince of Thebes, in Greece, who is said to have introduced into Greece the sixteen simple letters of the alphabet — a, b, g, d, e, i, k, l, m, n, o, p, q, r, s, v, which are therefore called Cadmean letters. — A Cadmean victory, a proverbial phrase for a victory in which the victors suffer as much as the vanquished; probably in allusion to the soldiers who sprung from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus, and having engaged in combat destroyed each other.

Cadmia (kad'mi-a), n. [L. cadmia, Gr. kadmia, kadmia, calamine.] 1. † A name given by old writers to calamine. — 2. An oxide of zinc which collects on the sides of furnaces where zinc happens to be present in an ore and is sublimed. Dana.

Cadmium (kad'mi-um), n. [From the above.] Sym. Cd. At. wt. 112. A metal discovered by M. Stromeyer, in 1817, in carbonate of zinc, at Hanover. Its colour is a fine white, with a shade of bluish gray, resembling that of tin. Its texture is compact, its fracture irregular, and it is susceptible of polish. In all its relations it is very analogous to zinc, and it is almost invariably associated with it. It is ductile and malleable, and when fused crystallizes in octahedrons. It melts below a red heat, and when strongly heated in the air it burns, forming a yellow oxide (Cd₂O). Its scarcity prevents its employment in the arts, but the oxide has been used as a pigment. Cadmium occurs in the form of carbonate, as an ingredient in various kinds of calamine, or carbonate of zinc. It is also found in the form of sulphide, as the rare mineral greenockite, and to the extent of 5 per cent. in some kinds of zinc blende. Like zinc, it forms only one oxide, chloride, sulphuret, &c.

Cadmium-yellow (kad'mi-um-yel-lō), n. A pigment prepared from the sulphide of cadmium. It is of an intense yellow colour, and possesses much body.

Cadrans (kad'rānz), n. [Properly a plural from Fr. cadrant, cadrant, lit. a quadrant.] An instrument for measuring the angles in cutting and polishing gems, and keeping the gems at the proper angle during the process. R. H. Knight.

Caducary (ka-dū'ka-ri), a. [L. caducarius, relating to property without a master.] In old law, relating to escheat, forfeiture, or confiscation.

Caducean (ka-dū'sé-an), a. Belonging to the caduceus or wand of Mercury.

Caduceus (ka-dū'sé-us), n. [L.] In class.

myth. Mercury's rod; a wand entwined by two serpents, borne by Mercury as an ensign of quality and office. On medals the caduceus is a symbol of peace and prosperity; in modern times it is used as a symbol of commerce, Mercury being the god of commerce. The rod represents power; the serpents, wisdom; and the two wings, diligence and activity.

Caducary (ka-dū'shi-a-ri), a. [L. caducius, falling.] In Scots law, a term applied to a right not acquired by succession.

Caducibranchiate (ka-dū'si-brang'ki-āt), n. [L. caducius, falling, and branchia, gills.]

In zool. a term applied to tailed amphibians, such as the newts, which lose the gills before attaining maturity.

Caducibranchiate (ka-dū'si-brang'ki-āt), n. [See above.] A caducibranchiate amphibian.

Caducity (ka-dū'si-ti), n. [Fr. caducité, from L. caducus, from cado, to fall.] A tendency to fall or decay; hence, the period of declining life; senility. 'A heterogeneous jumble of youth and caducity.' Lord Chesterfield. 'At once in a state of childhood and caducity.' Gibbon. [Rare.]

Caducous (ka-dū'kus), a. [See above.] Having a tendency to fall or decay; specifically, in zool. and bot. applied to organs that early drop off, as branchiae, floral envelopes, &c.

Caduket (ka-dū'ket), a. [See CADUCITY.] Perishing; frail; fleeting. [Rare.]

Cady (kad'i), n. A street porter in Edinburgh. See CADDE.

Cæcal (sē'kal), a. 1. Of or belonging to the cæcum. — 2. Having the form of a cæcum; bag-shaped; as, the cæcal extremity of a duct.

Cæcally (sē'kal-i), adv. In the form or manner of a cæcum.

In the former (the Articularia), . . . the intestine ends cæcally. Dr. H. A. Nicholson.

Cæcias (sē'si-as), n. [L. Gr. kai'rias.] The north-east wind. Milton.

Cæcilia, Cæcilia (sē-sil'i-a), n. [L. cæcus, blind, from the minute size of their eyes.] A genus of amphibians, formerly, on account of their external form, ranked with the ophidian reptiles. They are entirely destitute of limbs, and the eyes are very small, and nearly hidden by the skin. They are usually 1 to 2 feet in length, but often much longer. They constitute an order Ophiomorpha (Owen), of the class Amphibia.

Cæciliads, Cæciliæ (sē-sil'i-a-dē, sē-sil'i-ē), n. pl. A name given to the group or order of animals included in the above genus. Also called Cæcilians.

Cæcum (sē'kum), n. pl. Cæca (sē'ka). [L. cæcus, blind.] In compar. anat. a blind process in the alimentary canal of various animals. In fishes they are often numerous and long; and birds have generally two near the termination of the intestine. Mammals have commonly only one cæcum.

Cænozoic (sē-nō-zō'ik), a. See CAINOZOIC.

Cæno-stone (kæn or kōn stōn), n. The French equivalent for our Bath oolite. It is a cream-coloured building-stone of excellent quality, got near Caen in Normandy. Although soft in the quarry, it is of fine texture and hardens by exposure, so as to become extremely durable. Winchester and Canterbury Cathedrals, Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster, and many churches are built of it. It is still frequently used in England.

Cænomycetæ (sē-nō-mā'sē-i), n. pl. A group of parasitic fungi, including the forms commonly called rust and mildew, which have naked simple spores.

Cærebinæ (sē-rē-bi'nē), n. pl. The gull-guys, a sub-family of Australian and South American tenuirostral passerine birds, family Nectarinidae, of which the Cæreba Cyana of Cayenne and Guiana may be taken as the type. It is a brilliant bird of the size of a sparrow, its plumage being deeply and gorgeously dyed with azure, verditer, and velvet-black, arranged in a bold and striking manner. Its nest is neatly woven and pendulous on the extremity of a slender twig.

Cærule, Cærulean. See CERULE, CERULEAN.

Cæsalpinia (sē-zal-pin'i-a), n. [After Cæsalpinus, physician to Pope Clement VIII.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ. The species are trees or shrubs found in the warmer regions of both hemispheres, with showy yellow or red flowers, bipinnate leaves, and usually more or less prickly stems. The Brazil-wood of commerce is furnished by C. brasiliensis, C. erista, and C. echinata; and C. Sappan furnishes the red dye-wood called sappan-wood.

Cæsalpinieæ, Cæsalpinieæ (sē-zal-pin'i-ē, sē-zal-pin'ē-ē), n. pl. A sub-order of leguminous trees, of which Cæsalpinia (which see) is the type.

Cæsar (sē'zér), n. A title, originally a surname of the Julian family at Rome, which, after being dignified in the person of the dictator C. Julius Cæsar, was adopted by successive Roman emperors, and latterly came to be applied to the heir presumptive to the throne. The title was perpetuated in the Kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire, a dignity first assumed by Charlemagne. Sometimes in English literature it is nearly equivalent to emperor, conqueror. 'And she shall be sole victress, Cæsar's Cæsar.' Shak. (Rich. III. iv. 4.)

Cæsaean, Cæsaian (sē-zā-ré-an, sē-zā-ri-an), a. Of or pertaining to Cæsar. — Cæsaean section or operation, in midwifery, the operation by which the fetus is taken out of the uterus by an incision through the parietes of the abdomen and uterus, when the obstacles to delivery are so great as to leave no other alternative: said to be so named because Julius Cæsar was brought into the world in this way.

Cæsius (sē'zi-us), a. [L. cæsius, blue.] In bot. lavender-coloured; pale-blue, with a slight mixture of gray.

Cæsim (sē'zi-um), n. [L. cæsius, blue.] Sym. Ca. At. wt. 133. A rare alkaline mineral, first discovered by Bunsen and Kirchhoff by spectrum analysis in the saline waters of Dürkheim in Germany, and subsequently in other mineral waters. Its spectrum exhibits two characteristic blue lines. The metal occurs in the mineral lepidolite, and has been discovered in greatest abundance in the lepidolite of Hebron, Maine, U.S. It is always found in connection with rubidium. It belongs to the same group of elements with lithium, sodium, potassium, and rubidium, viz. the group of the alkali-metals.

Cæspitose, Cæspitose (sē'spi-tōs, sē'spi-tūs), a. See CESPITOSE.

Cæstus (sē'stus), n. See CESTUS.

Cæsura (sē'zū-ra), n. [L. cæsura, a cutting off, a division or stop, from cadere, cæsum, to cut off.] In pros. a pause or division in a verse; a separation, by the ending of a word or by a pause in the sense, of syllables rhythmically connected. Thus in the first of the following lines there is a cæsura or cæsural pause between the fourth and fifth syllables, in the second a cæsura between the fifth and sixth.

Lives through all life, extends through all extent Spreads undivided, operates unspent.

Cæsural (sē-zū'ral), a. Pertaining to the cæsura.

Caduceus.

Caf (kaf), n. The name of the mountain which, according to the Mohammedans, environs the whole earth, which is thus set within it like a finger in a ring.

Café (kaf-é), n. [Fr. café, a coffee-house.] A coffee-house; a restaurant. — Café chantant, a coffee-house in France where the guests are treated with music. Such houses have frequently inclosed yards in front planted with trees, under which the guests sit in summer listening to the singers, &c., who perform on a stage.

Cafemet (kaf'-e-net), n. [A corruption, through the influence of Fr. café, of Turk. kahveh-khanah, conkr. kahvehnah, coffee-house.] In Turkey, a hotel or house of rest for travellers; a coffee-house.

Caff (kaf), n. Chaff. [Scotch.]

Caffa (kaf-ä), n. A kind of painted cloth goods manufactured in India.

Caffeic (ka-fé-ik), a. Of or pertaining to coffee. — Caffeic acid, a peculiar vegetable acid (C₈H₆O₆) existing in coffee, composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen. Called also Caffeianic Acid and Chlorogenic Acid.

Caffeine (ka-fé-in), n. (C₈H₁₀N₄O₂) A slightly bitter, highly azotized substance, crystallizing in slender, silk-like needles, found in coffee-beans, tea-leaves, Paraguay tea, guarana, &c. Coffee contains from 0.8 to 3.4, and tea from 2 to 4 per cent. It is a weak base, and forms salts with an acid reaction. Doses of 2 to 10 grains induce violent nervous and vascular excitement. Called also Theine (which see).

Caffeone (ka-fé-on), n. The aromatic principle of coffee. It is a brown oil, heavier than water. An almost imponderable quantity gives an aroma to a quart of water.

Caffer-bread (kaf-er-bred), n. The spongy farinaceous pith of the trunk and cones of certain cyadaceous African plants of the genus Encephalartos, used by the Caffres as food. Written also Cafre-bread.

Caffer-corn (kaf-er-korn), n. A name given to Indian millet, or Sorghum vulgare, which is cultivated in portions of Africa as a cereal. Written also Cafre-corn. See DURRA, SORGHUM.

Caffetannic (kaf-é-tan-ik), a. Same as Caffeic (which see).

Caffia, Caffiah (kaf-i-lä), n. [Ar. and Per. kaffet, a caravan, a body of travellers.] An official Persian government caravan; a company of travellers or merchants.

Caffre (kaf-ér), n. One of a native race of Southern Africa; a Kafir or Kaffir. See KAFIR.

Cafftan. Same as Kaftan.

Cag (kag), n. [Dan. and Sw. kagge, a keg.] A small cask or barrel, differing from the barrel only in size, and containing a few gallons, but not of any definite capacity: more commonly written Keg.

Cage (kä), n. [Fr. cage, from L. cava, a hollow, from cavus, hollow (whence E. cave). For changes similar to cage from cava, see ABRIDGE.] 1. A box, or inclosure made of boards, or with lattice-work of wood, wicker, or wire, for confining birds or beasts. For the confinement of the more strong and ferocious beasts a cage is sometimes made of iron bars.

It happens with it (wedlock) as with cages; the birds without despair to get in, and those within despair to get out. Florio.

2. Formerly, a prison or place of confinement for petty malefactors. — 3. A skeleton framework of any kind; as, (a) in carp. an outer work of timber, inclosing another within it; as, the cage of a windmill, or of a staircase. (b) In mach. a framework to confine a ball-valve within a certain range of motion. (c) A wire guard placed in front of an induction-opening to allow liquids to pass, but prevent the passage of solids. (d) The framework of a hoisting apparatus, as the framework in which miners ascend and descend the shaft, and by which hutchies are raised and lowered. (e) Naut. an iron vessel formed of hoops placed on the top of a pole, and filled with combustibles. It is lighted an hour before high water, and marks an intricate channel navigable for the period it burns. — 4. A cup with a glass bottom and cover with a drop of water between containing animalcules to be examined under a microscope. — 5. In mining slang, a tap-room, or bar in the store attached to a work.

Cage (kä), v.t. pret. & pp. caged; ppr. caging. To confine in a cage; to shut up or confine. 'Caged nightingales.' Shak.

Caged (kä-jid), pp. or a. Resembling a cage or place of confinement. 'The caged cloister.' Shak.

Cageling (kä-j'ing), n. A bird kept in a cage; a cage-bird. Tennyson.

Cagmag (kag-mag), n. 1. Tough old geese sent to market; tough dry meat. — 2. An inferior kind of sheep. Halliseell. [Vulgar.]

Cagot (ka-gó), n. [Fr. perhaps from Armor. cacous, leprous. The Cagots are supposed to be descended from lepers.] One of a miserably degraded race of men inhabiting France, in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees, as also, formerly at least, Lower Brittany. In the middle ages they were believed to be cannibals and heretics, and treated with the greatest ignominy. Legally they are now on a level with other Frenchmen, but socially they are still regarded as degraded. From insufficient nourishment and their mode of life they are often deformed and diseased, and have been confounded with Cretins.

Cagui (kag-u-é), n. [Native name.] A name common to two species of monkeys of Brazil, one of them called Hapale Jacchus, and the other H. Chidius.

Cahier (ka-e-yä), n. [Fr. O Fr. cayer, quayer, L.L. quaternum, a sheet of four leaves, L. quatuor, four.] 1. A number of sheets of paper put loosely together; specifically, one of the successive portions of a work, when printed in parts or numbers. — 2. Report of proceedings of any body, as the legislature; a memorial.

Cahoot (ka-hót), n. [Perhaps from Fr. co-horte, a company.] A company or partnership; as, to go in cahoot with a person. Barlett. [Southern and Western States of America.]

Caic (ka-ék), n. Same as Caique.

Caillach (kyl'yach), n. [Gael.] An old woman.

Give something to the Highland caillachs that shall cry the coronach loudest. Sir W. Scott.

Caimacam (kä-ma-kam'), n. [Turk. kaimacam, lieutenant — kaim, vigilant, and mukam, a deputy.] A lieutenant or a lieutenant-general in the Turkish service; specifically, a title of the deputy of the grand vizier, and governor of Constantinople. Called also Caimacan.

Caiman. See CATMAN.

Cain-coloured (kän-kul-erd), a. A word found only in the following passage:—

No, forsooth, he has but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard—a cain-coloured beard. Shak. Mer. Wiv. I. 4. 73.

Supposed by some to be for cane-coloured; but Nares explains the word as meaning 'yellow or red as applied to hair; which being esteemed a deformity, was by common consent attributed to Cain and Judas.' Comp. As You Like It, III. 4. 9. The word cane does not occur in Shakespeare.

Cain-whale (kä-ing-whäl), n. Same as Cacing-whale.

Cainite (kän-ité), n. [From Cain.] A member of a strange sect of fanatical heretics of the second century, who professed to venerate Cain, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and the Sodomites. They imagined a variety of angels, attributing to each a particular sin, so that when they were about any wickedness they invoked the angel whom they fancied to preside over it. They held that the way to be saved was to gratify their lusts and evil passions, and are said to have asserted that the power which created heaven and earth was an evil one.

Cainozoic (kä-no-zó-ik), a. [Gr. kainos, recent, and zôé, life.] In geol. a term applied to the latest of the three divisions into which strata have been arranged, with reference to the age of the fossils they include. The Cainozoic system embraces the tertiary and post-tertiary systems of British geologists, exhibiting recent forms of life, in contradistinction to the Mesozoic, exhibiting intermediate, and the Paleozoic, ancient and extinct, forms. It corresponds nearly with what has been called the age of mammals. Written also Cenozoic, Kainozoic.

Caique (ka-ék'), n. [Fr. from Turk. kayık.] 1. A small skiff or rowing boat; especially a light skiff used in the Bosphorus, where it almost monopolizes the boat traffic. It may have from one to ten or twelve rowers. — 2. A Levantine vessel of larger size.

Calmer (kám'ér), n. One who or that which calms, or has the power to still and make quiet; one who or that which allays or pacifies.

Angling was a cheerer of his spirits, a diverter of sadness, a calmer of unquiet thoughts. J. Walton.

Calmly (kám'li), adv. In a calm manner; without disturbance, agitation, tumult, or violence; without passion; quietly. 'And calmly run on to bedience. Shak. 'The gentle stream which calmly flows. Denham.

Calmness (kám'nes), n. The state of being calm; (a) quietness; stillness; tranquillity, as of the elements; 'The gentle calmness of the flood.' Denham. (b) Quietness; mildness; unruffled state: applied to the mind, passions, or temper. 'Defend yourself by calmness or by absence.' Shak.—STR. Quietness, repose, composure, sedateness, placidity.

Calmuq, Calmuqk (kám'uk), n. 1. A member of a remarkable branch of the Mongol race, originally from Thibet, but now spread over a large portion of Asia.—2. The language spoken by the Calmuqs.

Calmly (kám'li), a. Calm; quiet; peaceable. 'A still and calmly bay.' Spenner. 'Tescuco's calmly lake. Southey. [Poetical.]

Calochortus (kal-ó-kórtus), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and chortos, grass.] A beautiful genus of bulbous plants from Columbia, Mexico, and California, nat. order Liliaceae, nearly allied to the fritillary and tulip.

Calodendron (kal-ó-den'dron), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and dendron, a tree.] A genus of a remarkable branch of the Cape Colony trees, nat. order Rutaceae. C. capense is an evergreen tree 40 feet high, with beautiful flowers and foliage. Called also Calodendrum.

Caligraphy (ka-log'ra-fi), n. Calligraphy (which see).

Calomel (kal-ó-mel), n. [Gr. kalos, fair, good, and melas, black, perhaps because it was good for black bile.] (Hg Cl.) Hemi-, di-, sub-, or proto-chloride of mercury, or mercurous chloride; a preparation of mercury much used in medicine, and also found native as horn-quicksilver. It is prepared by grinding in a mortar sulphate of mercury with as much mercury as it already contains, and heating the compound which is formed with common salt until it sublimes. The calomel is thus produced in di-metric crystals, the prisms being generally united in fibrous masses. It is dirty-white and translucent.—Precipitated calomel is a white heavy powder, with a lemon-yellow tinge. It is tasteless, inodorous, and insoluble in water. It becomes gray on exposure to light.

Calophyllum (kal-ó-fl'um), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and phyllon, a leaf.] A genus of plants, nat. order Guttiferae. The species are large timber-trees, with shining leaves which have numerous transverse parallel veins, giving the plants a very beautiful appearance; hence the name. C. inophyllum yields a medical resin, the tucamahac of the East Indies. The seeds afford an oil which is used for burning, for making ointment, &c. C. Calaba (calaba-tree), a tropical evergreen tree 60 feet high, with an edible green fruit, is a native of the West Indies and Brazil, and yields another variety of tucamahac.

Caloric (ka-ló'rik), n. [L. calor, heat.] The name given to a supposed subtle impalpable fluid to which the sensation and phenomena of heat were formerly attributed.—Sensible and insensible caloric, obsolete for sensible and latent heat. See under HEAT.

Caloric (ka-ló'rik), a. Pertaining to caloric.—Caloric engine, a name given by Captain Ericsson to his improved air-engine, to distinguish it from other air-engines on the same principle. Such engines are similar in principle and mode of working to the ordinary steam-engine, their motive power being derived from air expanded by heat instead of steam. The distinctive features of the improved caloric engines are that the air employed is compressed before being heated, and that the greater part of the waste heat is saved and used again and again, so as to effect a great saving of fuel. Many such engines are used, especially in America, for printing-presses and the like.

Caloricity (ka-ló-ris'i-ti), n. [Fr. calorificité.] That faculty in animals of developing a quantity of heat necessary to life, and to enable them to resist atmospheric cold, so as to preserve at all times and in every part a temperature nearly equal.

Caloriduct (ka-ló-rí-duk't), n. [L. calor, heat, and duco, ductum, to lead.] A tube or passage for conveying heat. See CALIDUCT.

Calorie (ka-ló-ré), n. [Fr.] In physics, the quantity of heat necessary to raise the temperature of a kilogramme of water one degree Centigrade. It is the French conventional unit used in calorimetry.

Calorific (ka-ló-rí-fa'shi-ent), a. Same as Calorificient.

Calorifere (ka-ló-rí-fár), n. [Fr. from L. calor, heat, and fero, to bear.] An apparatus for conveying and distributing heat; a term particularly applied to an apparatus for heating conservatories, &c., by means of hot water circulating in tubes.

Calorifant (ka-ló-rí-fí'ant), n. Same as Calorificient.

Calorific (ka-ló-rí-fík), a. Capable of producing heat; causing heat; heating; calorific; calorificient.

We distinguish the gravitative, luminiferous, and calorific properties of the sun. J. S. Mill.

—Calorific rays, certain rays emanating from the sun, which are not visible, and which are only manifested by their effects on the thermometer. Their presence is detected by placing a thermometer near the rays forming the solar spectrum by being transmitted through a glass prism. They are most powerful near the red end of the spectrum.

Calorification (ka-ló-rí-fí-ká'shon), n. The production of heat, especially animal heat.

Calorificient, Calorifient (ka-ló-rí-fí'shent, ka-ló-rí-fí'ent), n. [L. calor, heat, and facio, to make.] Heat-producing; relating to the power of producing heat: a term applied by physiologists to materials of food of which the basis is carbon, as fat, gum, sugar, starch, and which are believed to be expended in the production of heat in the system. Written also Calorifant.

Calorimeter (kal-ó-rim'e-tér), n. [L. calor, heat, and Gr. metron, measure.] An apparatus for measuring absolute quantities of heat or the specific or latent heat of bodies, as an instrument for measuring the heat given out by a body in cooling from the quantity of ice it melts or from the rise of temperature it produces in water around it.

Calorimetric (ka-ló-rí-met'rik), a. Of or belonging to the use of the calorimeter.

Calorimetry (kal-ó-rim'et-ri), n. The estimation of the specific or latent heat of bodies apart from the sensible changes of temperature; the art or process of using the calorimeter (which see).

Calorimotor (ka-ló-rí-mó'tér), n. [L. calor, heat, and motor, mover.] A galvanic instrument of one pair or a few pairs of very large plates to produce considerable heat effects, and in which the caloric influence or effects are attended by scarcely any electrical power.

Calorist (ka-ló-ríst), n. One of those who upheld the theory that the sensation and phenomena of heat were attributable to a fluid called caloric.

The theory of the calorists, as those who held this view were called, and called themselves, is now utterly disproved. Pop. Ency.

Calosoma (kal-ó-só'ma), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and sóma, body.] A genus of coleopterous insects of the family Carabidae. To this genus belongs the largest and most beautiful British insect of the family, the C. Sycophanta, which is about 1 inch long. Species of this genus occur in almost all countries.

Calotropis (ka-ló'tró-pis), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and tropis, a keel, alluding to the keel of the flower.] A genus of plants, nat. order Asclepiadaceae. The species are shrubs or small trees, natives of the tropics of the Old World. C. gigantea yields a tough fibre; its acid juices are used for cutaneous diseases, and a tincture called mudar obtained from the roots is similarly employed. See MUDAR.

Calotte (ka-lót'), n. [Fr. calotte, a skull-cap, dim. of cale. See CAUL.] 1. A plain skull-cap or coif of hair, satin, or other stuff worn in Catholic countries as an ecclesiastical ornament, and in England by sergeants-at-law on their wigs; also, a military skull-cap. After the Bourbon restoration the epithet Régiment de la Calotte was applied to the influence of the clergy in political matters. 2. Anything having the form of a small cap, as the cap of a sword-hilt.—3. In arch, a round cavity or depression in form of a cup or cap, lathed and plastered, used to diminish the elevation of a chapel, cabinet, alcove, &c., which would otherwise be too high for other pieces of the apartment. Sometimes written Calote.

Calottist (ka-lót'hist), n. A member of the Régiment de la Calotte, a society which sprang up at Paris in the last years of the reign of Louis XIV. and formed a regiment under the name La Calotte (a flat cap worn by the priests), which was the symbol of the society. All were admitted whose ridiculous behaviour, odd character, foolish opinions, &c., had exposed them to public criticism.

Calotype (kal'ó-tip), n. [Gr. kalos, beautiful, and typos, figure, impression.] The name given by Mr. Talbot to the process which he invented about 1840 of producing photographs by the action of light upon nitrate of silver. The paper is first washed on one side with a solution of nitrate of silver; when dry it is immersed in a solution of iodide of potassium; and again, after drying, in a mixture of nitrate of silver solution, acetic acid, and gallic acid. The paper is now exposed to the luminous image in the camera, after which the paper is again soaked in a solution of nitrate of silver and gallic acid, when the latent image makes its appearance, and is fixed by hyposulphite of soda solution. From the negative image a positive is then easily obtained.

Caloyer (ka-ló-ier), n. [Fr. from Mod. Gr. kalogeros, from Gr. kalos, beautiful, and geron, Mod. Gr. geros, an old man, the g in Mod. Gr. being pronounced like y.] One of a sect of monks of the Greek Church. They are also divided into celestes, who are employed in reciting their office from midnight to sunrise; anchores, who retire and live in hermitages; and recluses, who shut themselves up in grottoes and caverns on the mountains, and live on alms furnished to them by the monasteries.

Calp (kalp), n. A sub-species of carbonate of lime, of a bluish-black, gray, or grayish-blue colour, its streak being white. It is intermediate between compact limestone and marl, and forms a division of the carboniferous limestones of Ireland. Called also Argillo-ferruginous Limestone.

Calp-slates (kalp'sláts), n. pl. A series of shale, calp, and flaggy sandstone strata developed in Ireland between the two great bands of carboniferous limestone.

Calque (kalk), v. t. In painting, to calk (which see).

Calquing (kalk'ing), n. In painting, calking (which see).

Caltha (kál'tha), n. [L. caltha, supposed to be our Calendula officinalis, or pol-mari-gold.] A genus of ranunculaceous plants, with stout creeping root-stocks, and showy flowers composed entirely of petaloid sepals. The carpels contain many seeds. These herbs are found in the temperate and cold regions of both hemispheres. C. palustris (marsh marigold) is common in meadows and marshy places, and about the edges of rivers and lakes in Britain. A double variety is cultivated in gardens.

Calthrop (kál'throp), n. See CALTROPS.

Caltrop (kál'trop), n. [L.L. calcitrappa, from L. calc, calcis, a heel, and L.L. trappa, a snare.] 1. Milit. An instrument with four iron points disposed in such a manner that three of them being on the ground the other points upward. These are scattered on the ground where an enemy's cavalry are to pass to impede their progress by wounding the horse's feet.—2. In bot. a term applied first to the spiny heads or fruits of several plants from their resemblance to the military instrument, and then to the plants themselves. The common caltrop is Centaurea Calcitrapa (the star-thistle), found in waste places in the south of England. The heads are covered with long yellow spines. The name is also given to Tribulus terrestris, a plant of the Mediterranean region, with a spiny pentagonal fruit. The water caltrop is Trapa natans, the fruit of which has several horns formed of the indurated lobes of the calyx.

Calumba (ka-lum'ba), n. [From a mistaken notion that the plant came from Colombo, Ceylon.) A plant, Jatropha palmata, indigenous to the forests of Mozambique, nat. order Menispermaceae. The large roots are much used as a bitter tonic in cases of indigestion. American or false calumba is the bitter root of Fraxino Carolinensis, a gentianaceous herb found in North America.

Calumbine (ka-lum-bin), n. The bitter principle of calumba.

Calumbo (ka-lum-bō), n. Same as Calumba.

Calumet (ka-lum-met), n. [Fr. calumet, from Calumet, from the Christy Collection in British Museum.

1. calamus, a reed—a parallel form of calamus, a reed-pipe.] A kind of pipe used by the American Indians for smoking tobacco. Its bowl is usually of soft red soapstone, and the tube a long reed, ornamented with feathers. The calumet is used as a symbol or instrument of peace and war. To accept the calumet is to agree to the terms of peace, and to refuse it is to reject them. The calumet of peace is used to seal or ratify contracts and alliances, to receive strangers kindly, and to travel with safety. The calumet of war, differently made, is used to proclaim war.

Calumniate (ka-lum-ni-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. calumniated; ppr. calumniating. [L. calumniator, calumniatus, to calumniate, from calumnia, calumny. See CALUMNY.] To utter calumny regarding; to accuse, or charge falsely and knowingly, with some crime, offence, or something disreputable; to slander. 'To disdain and calumniate another' Ep. Sprat. 'Calumniated by apostates' Macaulay. — Aspersus, Defame, Calumniate, Slander. See under ASPERSE. SYN. To slander, defame, vilify, traduce, asperse, blacken, backbite, libel.

Calumniate (ka-lum-ni-āt), v. i. To charge one falsely and knowingly with a crime or offence, to propagate evil reports with a design to injure the reputation of another. 'Created only to calumniate' Shak.

Calumniation (ka-lum-ni-ā-tion), n. The act of calumniating, calumny.

The slander and calumniation of her principal counsellors agreed best with the humours of some malecontents within the realm. Beacon.

These descriptions are delivered dissuasively, and not thrown out in the heat of controversy and calumniation. T. Norton.

Calumniate (ka-lum-ni-āt), n. One who calumniates or slanders; one who falsely and knowingly accuses another of a crime or offence, or maliciously propagates false accusations or reports. 'The devil, the father of all calumniators and liars' Usher. 'The calumniators of Epicurus's philosophy' Craley.

A wicked thing is a calumniate. Brougham.

SYN. Slanderer, defamer, backbiter, libeller, detractor, traducer.

Calumniation (ka-lum-ni-ā-tion), n. Slandering. 'Calumniation information' Mounslay.

Calumnious (ka-lum-ni-ūs), a. Using calumny, containing or implying calumny; injurious to reputation; slanderous. 'Calumnious knave' Shak. 'Calumnious misstatements' Motley.

Virtue itself escapes not calumnious strokes. Shak. For thither he assembled all his trials, and with calumnious art Of counteracted truth thus held their ears. Milton.

Calumniously (ka-lum-ni-ūs-lī), adv. In a calumnious manner; slanderously. Mounslay; Sheldon.

Calumniousness (ka-lum-ni-ūs-nēs), n. The quality of being calumnious; slanderousness, defamation. The bitterness of my stile was plainness, not calumniousness. Ep. Norton.

Calumny (kal-'um-nī), n. [L. calumnia.] False accusation of a crime or offence, knowingly or maliciously made or reported, to the injury of another, untruths maliciously spoken to the detriment of another; defamatory reports, slander.

Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny. Shak. Chaumeth not the breeding bee Sweeter tones than calumny? Tennyson.

SYN. Slander, detraction, libel, falsehood, backbiting, evil-speaking, lying, defamation.

Calvary (kal-'va-ri), n. [L. calvaria, a skull, used in the Vulgate to translate the Hebrew Golgotha, from calva, a scalp without the hair, from calvus, bald.] 1. A place of skulls, Golgotha, the place where Christ was crucified on a small hill west of Jerusalem. — 2. In R. Cath. countries, a kind of chapel, sometimes erected on a hill near a city, and sometimes on the exterior of a church, as a place of devotion, in memory of the place where our Saviour suffered. In Calvaries of this sort the various scenes of his passion and crucifixion are represented by statuary and carving strongly coloured. — 3. A rocky mound or hill on which three crosses are erected, an adjunct to religious houses. — Calvary cross, or cross of Calvary, see CROSS.

Calvary, formerly on Mount Valerian, Paris.

Calve (kāl'), v. i. pret. & pp. calved; ppr. calving. (From calv, pl. calves, comp. D. kalven, Dan. kalve, to calve.) To bring forth a calf or calves. need sometimes contemptuously of human beings, and by Milton of the earth at the creation of cattle, etc. 'Not Romans though calved i' the porch o' the Capitol' Shak.

Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve? Job xxxix.

The grassy clove now calved. Milton.

Calver (kal-'vēr), v. i. 1. In old cookery to prepare (fish) in a certain way, apparently by a kind of pickling. 'Larks, woodcocks, calver'd salmon.' Manning.

My foot-boy shall eat pheasants, calver'd salmon, knots, godwin, lampreys. S. Jonson.

2. As a modern term, to crump (fish). Nares. Calver (kal-'vēr), v. i. To be susceptible of being calvered. See above.

For his flesh the groyling's, even in his worst season, is so firm, and will so easily calver that in plain truth he is very good meat at all times. Coke.

Calves'-snout (kāl-'snout), n. A plant, Antirrhinum majus, so called from a fancied resemblance in the seed-vessel to a calf's head. Called also Snappragon.

Calville (kal-'vil'), n. [Fr.] A sort of apple. Calving (kāl'ing), n. The act of bringing forth a calf; used specifically of cows, whales, and seals.

The Russians providently prohibit bay-whaling, a practice destructive to the cow whales about the time of calving. Prof. H. F. Feltz.

Calvinism (kal-'vin-izm), n. The theological tenets or doctrines of John Calvin, who was born in Picardy in France, and in 1536 chosen professor of divinity and minister of a church in Geneva. The distinguishing doctrines of this system are, predestination, particular redemption, total depravity, irresistible grace, and the certain perseverance of the saints.

Calvinist (kal-'vin-ist), n. A follower of Calvin; one who embraces the theological doctrines of Calvin.

Calvinistic, Calvinistical (kal-'vin-ist'ik, kal-'vin-ist'ik-sil), a. Pertaining to Calvin or to his opinions in theology.

Calvinism (kal-'vin-iz), v. i. To convert to Calvinism.

Calvish (kāl-'ish), a. Like a calf. Sheldon. Calvities (kal-'vish-ēz), n. [L. from calvus, bald.] Diffused or general baldness, appearing generally first on the crown or on the forehead and temples.

Calvity (kal-'vī-tī), n. See CALVITIES. Calx (kalk), n. pl. Calces, Calces (kalk-'ēz, kalk-'ēz). [L. calx, limestone, whence A. Lat. calx, E. chalk.] 1. Properly lime or chalk, but applied formerly to the substance of a metal or mineral which remains after being subjected to violent heat or calcination. Metallic calces are now generally called oxides.

Gold, that is more dense than lead, resists per se all the dividing power of fire; and will not be reduced into a calx or lime by such operations as reduces lead into it. Sir K. Digby.

2. Lime recently prepared by calcination. — 3. Broken and refuse glass, which is restored to the pots.

Calycanthaceae (kal-'i-kan-thā-'ē-sē), n. pl. [Gr. kalyx, a calyx, and anthos, a flower.] A nat. order of dicotyledonous plants, allied to Magnoliaceae, but with aberrant characters which indicate affinities with other natural orders. They are hardy shrubs, well known in gardens for the delicious fragrance of their blossoms. The order contains only two genera—Calycanthus, the best known of the two species of which is C. floridus, or Carolina allspice, a sweet-scented shrub with yellow flowers, whose bark is used as cinnamon in the United States, and Chimonanthus, the only species of which, C. fragrans (Japan allspice), has lemon-coloured flowers.

Calycanthemous (kal-'i-kan-thē-'mūs), a. [Gr. kalyx, a calyx, and anthos, a flower.] In bot. a term applied to plants having the corolla and stamens inserted in the calyx.

Calyciflorous (ka-'lī-'fī-'rō-'rē), n. pl. [L. calyx, a calyx, and flos, floris, a flower, a corolla.] According to Decandolle, a sub-class of dicotyledons or angiosperms, distinguished generally by having a calyx and corolla (dichlamydeous), petals separate (polypetalous or dipetalous) or united (monopetalous or gamopetalous), and the stamens inserted either on the side of the calyx (perigynous) or above and on the ovary (epigynous).

Calyciflorate (ka-'lī-'fī-'rō-'rāt), a. In bot. having the stamens inserted in the calyx.

Calyciform (ka-'lī-'fī-'rō-'rāl), a. In bot. having the form of a calyx.

Calycinal, Calycine (ka-'lī-'fī-'nāl, kal-'fī-'nāl), a. In bot. pertaining to a calyx; situated on a calyx.

Calycle, Calycule (kal-'ī-'kl, kal-'ī-'klū), n. [L. calyculus, dim. of calyx, Gr. kalyx, a calyx, a cup.] 1. In bot. an outer accessory calyx, or set of leaflets or bracts looking like a calyx, as in the pink. — 2. In zool. a term applied to the small cuplike prominences, containing each a polype, covering the surface of many corals, better known as Calices (which see).

Calycoid (kal-'ī-'klōid), a. Same as Calyculate (which see).

Calyculate, Calyculated (ka-'lī-'fī-'lāt, ka-'lī-'fī-'lāt-ed), a. In bot. having bracts which resemble an additional external calyx.

Calymene (ka-'līm-'ē-nē), n. A genus of fossil trilobites found in the Silurian rocks.

Calymon (kal-'yūn), n. Flint or pebble stone, used in building walls, etc. Pelagrove, Promptorium, Parvulorum.

Calypso (ka-'lī-'pō), n. [After Calypso, a mythological being of ancient Greece, celebrated for her beauty and fascination.] A genus of orchidaceous plants remarkable for their beauty. The C. borealis is a small tuberous plant found in high latitudes throughout the northern hemisphere, and having only a single thin, many-nerved leaf, and a single rose-coloured flower at the end of a slender sheathing stem. It grows in woods, especially of firs, appearing as soon as the snow melts.

a. Moss. b. Capsule with calyptra. c. d. with calyptra removed.

Calyptra (ka-'lī-'p'tra), n. [G. calyptra, a veil or covering.] In bot. the hood of the theca or capsule of mosses. It is the archegonium which has continued to grow and has been carried up by the elonoil, pound; ū, ūc. abuse; y, ūc. say.

Fāle, thr. fat, fall; mē, met, hér; pine, pēn; nōte, not, mōve; tūbe, tub, bull;

gation of the peduncle of the capsule. In liverworts the archegonium is burst through by the growing peduncle and the calyptra remains at its base. The same name is given to any hood-like body connected with the organs of fructification in flowering plants. In Pilea it covers over the flower and is formed of united bracts; in Eucalyptus and Eudemia it is simply a lid or operculum to the stamens.

Calyptraeidae (ka-lip-tré-dé), n. pl. A family of gastropod molluscs, known by collectors as bonnet or chambered limpets. The typical genus Calyptra includes the cup-and-saucer limpet.

Calyptrate (ka-lip-trát), a. In bot. furnished with a calyptra, also applied to the calyx when it comes off like a lid or extinguisher.

Calyptriform (ka-lip-tri-form), a. Having the form of a calyptra.

Calystegia (kal-i-sté-jí-a), n. [Gr. kalyx, the calyx, and stégē, a covering, two bracts hiding the calyx.] A genus of plants, nat. order Convolvulaceae, composed of species separated from Convolvulus because of the two large bracts which inclose the calyx. The species are lactescens, glabrous, twining or prostrate herbs, with solitary one-flowered peduncles. Two British species, C. sepium and C. Soldanella, are known by the name of bindweed.

Calyx (ká'lik-s), n. pl. Calyces, Calyxes (ká'li-séz, ká'lik-séz). [L. calyx, the cup or calyx of a flower, from Gr. kalyx, a calyx, a husk or covering, from kalyptēs, to cover, conceal.] 1. In bot. the exterior covering of a flower within the bracts and external to the corolla, which it incloses and supports, and consisting of several verticillate leaves called sepals, united by their margins (mono- or gamosepalous, b) or distinct (poly- or dialysepalous, a), usually of a green colour and of a less delicate texture than the corolla. In endogens the venation of the sepals is parallel, in exogens reticulated. The part formed by the union of the sepals is called the tube; the upper part, where the sepals are free, is the limb. In some plants the calyx grows to the sides of the ovary, except, perhaps, a small portion at the extremity, in which case it is termed superior, but when it is quite separate from the ovary it is called inferior.—2. In anat. a small cup-like membranous canal, several of which invest the points of the papillae of the kidney. The union of the calyces forms the three infundibula which open into the pelvis of the kidney, whither they convey the urine.

Calzoonst (kal-zónz'), n. pl. [O. Fr. calçons, Mod. Fr. calçons, from It. calzonis, ang. of calzon, a stocking, from L. calceus, a shoe.] An under-garment worn on the lower limbs; drawers.

The better sort of these sex here wear linen drawers or calzoonst. Sir T. Herbert.

Cam (kam), n. [O. E. camð, a comb, a crest; comp. Dan. kam-hjul, G. kamm-rad, a cog-wheel, from kam, kamm, a comb.] In mach. a simple contrivance for converting a uniform rotatory motion into a varied rectilinear motion; a projecting part of a wheel or other revolving piece so placed as to give an alternating or varying motion to another piece that comes in contact with it and is free to move only in a certain direction; a cam-wheel. A common variety of the cam is that better known as the eccentric (which see). Various forms, such as those exemplified in figs 1 and 2, are employed to impress accelerated or retarded motions. The form shown in fig 3 is employed when two or more strokes of the rectilinear motion are required to be produced during one revolution of the rotatory part.—Solid cam, a form of cam employed when the series of changes in velocity and direction required are too numerous to be included in a single Cams.

1. Elliptical cam, used for giving motion to the levers of punching and shearing machines. 2. The heart-cam or heart-wheel, much used in cotton machinery to produce a regular ascent and descent of the rail on which the spindles are situated. 3. Form of cam much used in iron-works for setting in motion the tilt-hammers.

rotation of a cam-plate. The cam is formed on the surface of a cone, either parallel to the axis or spirally, and the cone as it revolves is made to travel also endlong by means of a screw. Usually the spindle passing through it is screwed and works in a fixed nut to communicate this endlong motion.

Cam (kam), a. [W. Gael. Ir. cam, crooked. Comp. Gr. kamptō, to bend.] Crooked; bending. See KAM.

Camaleu, n. See CAMATEU.

Camail (ka-máil), n. [Fr., a camail, also a head-dress worn by priests in winter, from Fr. capmail, cap, from L. caput, the head, and mail, See MAIL.] 1. Mitre, the chain-mail or armour appertaining to the head-piece, as the casque or bascinet, and falling down from it over the shoulders like a tippet, so to form a guard for the sides of the head, throat, and chest, worn by knights in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. 2. Eccles, a name sometimes given to the almuce (which see).

Camail.

Camaldolite, Camaldulian (ka-mal'dó-lit, kam-al-dó'li-an), n. A member of a nearly extinct fraternity of monks founded in the Vale of Camaldoli in the Apennines in 1018, by St. Romuald, a Benedictine monk. They were originally hermits, but as their wealth increased they associated in convents. They have always been distinguished for their extreme asceticism, their rules in regard to fasting, silence, and penances being most severe. Like the Benedictines they wear white robes.

Camara (kam'a-ra), n. A hard, tough, and durable wood obtained in Essequibo, from Dipteryx odorata. It is well adapted for shafts, mill-wheels, or cogs. Simmonds.

Camarella (kam-a-rí-la, Sp. pron. ka-na-rí'ya), n. [Sp., a small room, a dim. from camara, L. camera, camara, a vault. See CHAMBER.] A company of secret counsellors or advisers; a cabal; a clique: from meaning the private chamber of the king, the word came to express collectively courtiers, sycophants, priests, and such uncredited and secret councillors, in opposition to that of a legitimate ministry. Encircled with a dangerous camarella. Times newspaper.

Camassia (ka-masí-a), n. The latinized form of gusmash, and the name of the genus to which that plant is referred. See QUAMASH.

Camata (kam'a-ta), n. The commercial name for the half-grown acorns of the Quercus Egilops, dried and imported for tanning. In a still younger condition they are called camatina.

Camatina (kam-a-tí-na), n. The commercial name for the incipient acorns of the Quercus Egilops, which are imported for tanning.

Camateu, Camaleu (ka-má'té), n. [Fr. camaleu, a form equivalent to cameo (which see).] 1. A stone or an onyx engraved in relief; a cameo (which see).—2. In fine arts, monochrome painting or painting with a single colour, varied only by the effect of chiaro-oscuro. Pictures in two or three tints where the natural hues of the objects are not copied may also be called en camateu.

We speak of brown, red, yellow, green, and blue camateus, according to their principal colours.

Cambaye (kam-bá'), n. A kind of cotton cloth made in Bengal and elsewhere in India.

Camber (kam'bér), n. [Fr. cambrer, to arch, to vault, to bend, from L. camere, a vault, a chamber.] 1. A convexity upon an upper surface, as a deck amidships, a bridge, a beam, a lintel.—2. The curve of a ship's plank.—3. The part in a dockyard where timber is stored, and where cambering is performed; also, the small dock for loading and unloading timber—Camber window, a window arched at the top.

Camber (kam'bér), v. t. To arch; to bend; to curve ship-planks.

Camber-beam (kam'bér-bém), n. In arch. A beam which is laid upon the straining-beam of a truncated roof, and supports the covering of the summit.

Cambered (kam'béréd), pp. or a. Bent upwards in the middle; arched; convex.—Cambered deck (a) one which is higher in the middle or arched, but drooping toward the stem and stern. (b) An irregular deck.

Cambering (kam'bér-ing), p. and a. Bending; arched; as, a deck lies cambering.

Camber-keel (kam'bér-kéid), a. Applied to a keel slightly arched upward in the middle of the length, but not so much as to be hogged.

Camberwell Beauty (kam'bér-wel bó'ti), n. A rare British butterfly, Vanessa Atalanta, so named from having been sometimes found at Camberwell when it was more rural than now, and from its great beauty. The wings are deep, rich, velvety brown, with a band of black, containing a row of large blue spots around the brown, and an outer band or margin of pale yellow dappled with black spots. The caterpillar feeds on the willow.

Cambial (kam'bí-al), a. [L. cambiatus, from L. ambio, to exchange.] Belonging to exchanges in commerce. [Rare.]

Cambist (kam'bíst), n. [Fr. cambiator, from L. ambio, to exchange.] One who has to do with exchange, or is skilled in the science of exchange; one who deals in notes and bills of exchange; a banker.

The word cambiat, though a term of antiquity, is even now a technical word of some use among merchant traders and bankers. Kear.

Cambistry (kam'bís-trí), n. The science of exchange, weights, measures, &c.

Cambium (kam'bí-um), n. [L. ambio, to exchange, from the alterations occurring in it.] 1. In bot. a mucilaginous viscid substance forming a layer immediately under the liber of plants, now known to consist entirely of cellular tissue, composed of growing cells with very thin walls, retaining their primordial utricle, and largely charged with the fluid to which the name of cambium was once given. The growth of the wood and bark takes place in this layer.—2. A name formerly given to a fancied nutritious humour, which was supposed to repair the materials of which the body is composed.

Camblet (kam'blet), n. See CAMLET.

Camboge (kam-bó'f or kam-bó'f), See GAMBOGE.

Camboose (kam-bó's), n. Same as Caboose.

Cambraine (kam'bra-sén), n. A kind of fine linen cloth fabricated in Egypt, so called from resembling cambric.

Cambrel (kam'brel), n. A crooked piece of wood or iron to hang meat on. See GAM-BREL.

Cambrian (kam'bri-an), a. Relating or pertaining to Wales or Cambria.

The Cambrian mountains, like far clouds,
That skirt the blue horizon, dusky rise.

Thomson.

—Cambrian group, in geol. an extensive series of gneisses, sandstones, and slates, often metamorphosed into chlorite and mica schists, and gneiss, and lying under the lower Silurian beds. A few fossils occur in the series. They may be regarded as the bottom rocks of the Silurian system.

Cambrian (kam'bri-an), n. A Welshman.

Cambrio (kam'brík), n. A species of fine white linen fabric, said to be named from Cambury in Flanders, where it was first manufactured. An imitation of cambrie is also made of fine cotton yarn, hard twisted. 'Cadisees, cambries, lawns.' Shak.

Cambro-Briton (kam'bró-brit-on), n. A Welshman.

Came (kám), pret. of come (which see).

Came (kám), n. In glazing, a small slender rod of cast lead, 12 or 14 inches long, of which, by drawing it through a species of vice, glaziers make their turned or milled lead for joining the panes or quarrels of glass.

Camel (kam'el), n. [From L. camelus, Gr. kamelos, from Heb. g'mal, camel.] A large quadruped of the genus Camelus, family Camelidae (or Tylopoda), and order Ruminantia, used in Asia and Africa for carrying burdens, and for riding on. It is characterized by the absence of horns, by having 16 teeth in the upper jaw, 2 incisors, 2 canines, and 12 molars—and 18 in the lower—8 incisors, 2 canines, and 10 molars—and a fissure in the upper lip. It has a very long neck, and a broad elastic foot, ending in two small hoofs, which does not sink readily in the sand of the desert. The dromedary or Arabian camel (Camelus dromedarius) has only one adipose hump on the middle of the back, four callous protuberances on the fore legs, and two on the hind legs. It is a native of the Arabian deserts, and is chiefly confined to Arabia and Egypt in a domesticated state. There are two varieties, one strong and slow, for burdens, the other slighter and faster, for travelling. The Bactrian camel, or common camel (Camelus bactrianus), has two humps on the back, and is stouter and more muscular than the dromedary. The South American members of this family constitute the genus Aschelus (which see) or llamas; they have no humps. Camels constitute the riches of an Arabian, without them he could neither subsist, carry on trade, nor travel over sandy deserts. Their milk is his common food. By the camel's power of sustaining abstinence from drink for many days, and of subsisting on a few coarse, dry, prickly plants, it is peculiarly fitted for the parched and barren lands of Asia and Africa. Camels carry 600 to 1000 lbs. burden, and are rapid in their course. The hair of the camel is imported into this country chiefly for the purpose of being manufactured into fine pencils for drawing and painting. In the East, however, it serves for the fabrication of tents, carpets, and wearing apparel. The Camel-insect, Camel-loanet (kam'el-in-sekt, kam'el-lo'net), n. Names given to orthopterous insects of the genus Mantia, or praying insects, from the long thorax resembling the elongated neck of the quadruped.

Camellia (ka-mel'ia), n. [After George Joseph Kamel, a Moravian Jesuit.] A genus of beautiful trees or shrubs, nat. order Ternstroemiaceae, with showy flowers and elegant dark-green, shining, laurel-like leaves, nearly allied to the plants which yield tea. C. japonica is the origin of the many double varieties of our gardens. C. Saemangus is mixed with tea in China, the leaves being said to give fragrance and flavour to other teas. All the species are natives of Asia and the Eastern Archipelago.

Camelopard (ka-mel'o-pard or kam'el-o-pard), n. [L. camelus, a camel, and pardalis, a leopard.] Same as Giraffe.

Camelopardalis (kam'el-o-pär'da-lis), n. 1. A genus of ruminant quadrupeds of which the camelopard (C. Giraffe) is the sole species. The genus is co-extensive with the family Camelopardidae (which see).—2. A northern constellation formed by Revelius. It is situated between Capheus, Perseus, Ursa Major and Minor, and Draco, and contains thirty two stars.

Camelopardal (ka-mel'o-pär-del), n. An imaginary beast of heraldic creation, formed by the addition of two long horns, slightly curved backward, on the head of the camelopard.

Camelopardidae (kam'el-o-pär'di-dä), n. pl. A family of the Ruminantia, comprising only one genus, the Camelopard. See GIRAFFE.

Camelornithes (ka-mel'or-nith's), n. pl. (Gr. kamelos, a camel, and ornis, ornithos, a bird.) A name occasionally given to the family of birds which includes the ostrich, from their traversing the desert like camels.

Camelot (kam'el-lot), n. Camelot.

Camelry (kam'el-ri), n. A place where camels are brought to be laden or unladed.

Camel's-hair (kam'el's-här), n. The hair of the camel, imported into this country chiefly for the manufacture of fine pencils for drawing and painting.

Camel's Thorn (kam'el's thorn), n. A spiny leguminous plant, Alhagi Camelorum, of which the camel is very fond, and which yields a manna-like exudation from its leaves and branches.

Camel-swallower (kam'el-swo'l'der), n. 1. A term applied to a weakly credulous person, one who swallows incredible stories.—2. A person severely punctilious in trifling matters, but loose in greater. See MAT. XXII. 24.

Camelus (ka-mé'lus), n. The generic name of the camel, including two species, C. bactrianus and C. dromedarius. See CAMEL.

Camenes (ka-mé'n's), n. In logic, a mnemonic word to express a syllogism in the fourth figure having one universal affirmative and one universal negative premise and a universal negative conclusion.

Cameo (kam'ë-o), n. [It. cameo, cammeo, from L. L. cammeus, a word of uncertain origin.] A general name for all stones cut in relief, in contradistinction to those hollowed out, or intaglios. More particularly, a cameo is a stone composed of several different coloured layers having a subject in relief cut upon one or more of the upper layers, an under layer of a different colour forming the ground. For this purpose the ancients used the onyx, carnelian, agate, amethyst, &c. The shells of various molluscs, the inner strata of whose shells are sometimes differently coloured from the outer, are now much used for making cameos. Those best suited for the purpose are the bull's mouth, the shell of Canis ruga, the warty helmet-shell of Canis tuberosus, the horned helmet-shell of Canis cornuta, and the queen-conch of Strombus gigas. Formerly written Cammeo.—Camée incrustation, the art of producing bas-relief casts within a coating of flint-glass. The process consists in making the article to be incrustated of less fusible material than the glass, which is welded to the article in a soft condition.

Caméotype (kam'ë-tip), n. In photography, a name given to a small vignette daguerrotype for mounting in a jewelled setting like a cameo.

Camera (kam'ë-ra), n. [L. a vault, a chamber, from Gr. kamara, anything arched.] 1. In one arch an arched roof, ceiling, or covering; a vault.—2. The variety of camera obscura used by photographers. See below.—Camera lucida [L., lit. clear chamber], an invention of Wollaston the chemist, for the purpose of facilitating the delineation of distant objects, by producing a reflected picture of them upon the paper, and also copying or reducing drawings. It consists of a solid prismatic piece of glass, mounted upon a brass frame. The prism has its angles so arranged that the rays from the object are reflected upon the paper, and is covered at top by a metallic eye-piece, the hole in which lies half over the edge of the prism, so as to afford a person looking through a view of the picture reflected through the glass, and a direct view of his pencil or tracing point. In the figure the object f to be traced is opposite the perpendicular surface of the prism d c, and the rays proceeding from f pass through this surface and fall on the inclined plane e b, making an angle with e c of 67½°, from this they are reflected at an equal angle to the plane e b, making an angle of 135° with b c, and are again reflected to the eye at e above the horizontal plane, which makes an angle of 67½° with the last reflection. The rays of light from the object, proceeding upwards from A towards the eye of the observer, the observer would be led to Camera Lucida.

Imagine the image at m, and by placing the paper below in this place, the image may be traced with a pencil. The brass frame of the prism has usually two lenses, one concave and the other convex, the former to be used in front between f and d c, for short-sighted persons, and the latter at e for long sight. The size of the picture may also be increased or diminished by lengthening or shortening brass tubes connected with the frame. This instrument has undergone various modifications. It is extremely convenient on account of its portability.—Camera obscura [L., lit. dark chamber], an apparatus in which the images of external objects, received through a double convex lens, are exhibited distinctly, and in their natural colours, on a white surface placed at the focus of the lens. The simplest form of this instrument consists of a darkened chamber, into which no light is permitted to enter, except by a small hole in the window shutter. A picture of the objects opposite the hole will then be seen on the wall or a white screen placed so as to receive the light coming from the opening. A convex lens may be fixed in the hole of the shutter. Portable camera obscura are constructed of various forms, but the design of them all is to throw the images of external objects, as persons, houses, trees, landscapes, &c., upon a plane or curved surface, for the purpose of drawing, amusement, or getting photographic pictures. The surface on which the image is seen may be paper, and thus, most esteemed hair comes from Persia.—2. A water-tight structure placed beneath a vessel to raise it in the water, in order to assist its passage over a shoal, a bar, or to enable it to be navigated in shoal water. It is first filled with water and sunk, in order to be fixed on. The water is then pumped out, when the camel gradually rises, lifting the vessel with it and the process is continued until the ship is enabled to pass over the shoal. Camels have also been used for raising sunken vessels.

Camel (Camelus bactrianus).

Camel-backed (kam'el-bakt), n. Having a back like a camel, hump-backed. 'Not that he was crook-shouldered or camel-backed.' Fuller

Camel-bird (kam'el-bërd), n. A name applied to the ostrich.

Camelion (ka-mé-lion), n. Same as Chameleon.

Camelidae (ka-mel'i-dä), n. pl. A family of quadrupeds, including the true camels of the eastern hemisphere, and the llamas of the western. They are the only ruminants with canine and incisor teeth in the upper jaw.

Camellina (kam-e-lin'na), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Cruciferae. C. asiatica (gold of pleasure) has obovate pods and small yellow flowers. It is found in Britain growing in cultivated fields, chiefly among haz.

Camellina, n. Camlet; a stuff made of camel's hair. Chausser by introducing the hand, the figure may be traced with a pencil; but the picture is most distinctly seen when the image is formed on the back of a silverized mirror.

Camera Obscura.

The figure represents a portable camera obscura. A rays of light passing through a convex lens and reflected from a mirror placed at an angle of 45° upon a horizontal plate of ground glass, where they form an uninverted image, and can be easily traced. The camera obscura employed by photographers is a box, one half of which slides into the other, with a tube in front containing an object-glass at its extremity. The object-glass is usually compound, which has the advantage of giving the same effective focal length as a single length of smaller radius of curvature, while it permits the employment of a larger aperture, and consequently gives more light. At the back of the box is a slide of ground glass, on which the image of the object to be depicted is thrown. The focussing is performed in the first place by sliding the one half of the box into the other, and then by means of a pinton attached to the tube in front which moves the lens. When the image has thus been rendered as sharp as possible, the ground-glass slide is removed and a sensitized slide substituted, which not only receives but retains the image.

Cameralistics (kam'ér-a-list'iks), n. [G. cameralist, a financier, from It. camérale, pertaining to a camera, or treasury, from L. camera, a chamber; comp. camerlingo.] The science of state finance. Brande & Cox. [Rare.]

Caméraria (kam'ér-á-ri-a), n. [After Caméraria, a Nuremberg botanist.] A genus of handsome flowering plants, nat. order Apocynaceae. The species are natives of hot climates, and are cultivated in our hot-houses.

Camérate (kam'ér-át), v.t. pret. & pp. camérated; ppr. camérating. [L. camera, camerare, from camera, an arched roof.] To build in the form of an arch or vault. [Rare.]

Camérated (kam'ér-át-ed), a. 1. In arch, arched; vaulted; as, a camérated roof. Weale.—2. In conch. divided by partitions into a series of chambers; chambered; as, a camérated shell. Owen.

Camération (kam'ér-á-shon), n. An arching or vaulting. Boelyn. [Rare.]

Caméritelous (kam'ér-it'e-lus), a. [L. camera, a chamber, and tela, a web.] A term applied to spiders that make intricate webs to hide themselves.

Caméringo (kam'ér-lén'go), n. [It., a chamberlain, from L. camera, a chamber.] The highest officer in the papal household: the chamberlain. The cardinale camerlingo was formerly the head of the government, having the control of the treasury, administering justice, and exercising almost sovereign power when the papal chair was vacant.

Cameronian (kam-ér-ó-ni-an), n. 1. One of the followers of Richard Cameron in Scotland, who refused to accept the indulgence granted to the Presbyterian clergy in the persecuting times of Charles II., lest by so doing they should be understood to recognize his ecclesiastical authority. They constituted the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, the majority of which in 1876 joined the Free Church.—2. pl. A name given to the 26th Regiment of British Infantry, from its having been originally raised out of the Cameronians who flocked to Edinburgh during the Revolution of 1688.

Camérostoma (kam-ér-ós'to-ma), n. [Gr. kamara, a vault, and stoma, a mouth.] The anterior part of the body of Arachnida, forming a vault over the manducatory organs.

Camése (ka-més'), n. [See CHEMISE.] A kind of shirt. 'With his anowey camése and his shaggy capote.' Byron.

Camion (ká'mi-on), n. [Fr.] A truck or wagon used for transporting cannon.

Camis, Camiset (kam'is, ka-més'), n. [See CHEMISE.] A light loose dress or robe of silk or other material. 'All in a camis light of purple silk.' Spenser.

Camisado, Camisado (kam-i-sád', kam-i-sá'do), n. [Fr. camisade, Sp. camisado, O. Fr. camise, a shirt. See CHEMISE.] 1. A shirt worn by soldiers over their armour in a night attack to enable them to recognize each other. 'Two thousand of our best men, all in camisadoes with scaling ladders.' Sir R. Williams.—2. An attack by surprise at night or at break of day, when the enemy is supposed to be in bed, properly by soldiers wearing the camisado.

They had appointed the same night to have given a camisado on the English. Sir J. Hayward.

Camisard (kam'i-zárd), n. [From O. Fr. camise, a shirt; comp. camisade.] One of the French Calvinists of the Cevennes in revolt from 1688 till 1705.

Camisated (kam'i-sát-ed), a. [See CAMIS, CHEMISE.] Dressed with a shirt above the other garments. Johnson.

Camisole (kam'i-sól), n. [Fr. dim. of O. Fr. camise, L. L. camisia, a chemise.] 1. A short light garment worn by ladies when dressed in negligé.

Mrs. O'Dowd, the good housewife, arrayed in curl-papers and a camisole, felt that her duty was to act and not to sleep. Thackeray.

2. A strait-jacket put upon lunatics.—3. A sort of strait-jacket of stout sackcloth, very stiff and hard, fastened with several strong buckles, and with the sleeves sewed up at the ends so that the hands cannot get out, put upon a prisoner in France after condemnation to the guillotine, to prevent his injuring himself or others.

Camister (kam'is-tér), n. [Lit. one wearing a camis or camise.] A clergyman; a minister. [Vagabonds' slang.]

Camlet (kam'let), n. [See ANGORA GOAT.] A stuff originally made of camel's hair, now made sometimes of wool, sometimes of silk, sometimes of hair, especially that of goats, with wool or silk. The pure oriental camlet is made solely from the hair of the Angora goat. Sometimes written Camelot.

Camleted (kam'let-ed), a. Coloured, veined, or undulated like camlet. [Rare.]

Camletteen, Camletto (kam-let-tén', kam-let'tó), n. A kind of fine worsted camlet.

Cammas (kam'mas), n. Quamash (which see).

Cammock (kam'ok), n. [A. Sax. camnoc.]

A plant. Same as Rest-harrow. [Southern England.]

Cammoocky (kam'ok-i), a. Having a disagreeable goat-like smell: a term applied to cheese from the idea that this smell is due to the cows eating cammock. [Southern England.]

Camomile (kam'ó-mil), n. See CHAMOMILE.

Camorra (ka-mor'ra), n. A secret society in Naples and other large Neapolitan cities, whose members, styled Camorristi, exercised a lawless influence over the lower classes, appearing openly, and claiming the right of settling disputes, extorting a part of the money due for purchases, rents, wages, gaming, &c., and undertaking for money the commission of serious crimes.

Camoufflet (ka-mó-fá), n. [Fr.] Mit. a mine with a charge so small as not to produce any crater. Such a mine is often sunk in the wall of earth between two parallel galleries, in order, by blowing the earth into one of them, to suffocate or cut off the retreat of the miner who is at work in it. When used for this purpose it is also called a Stifter.

Camous, Camoused (ká'mus, ká'must), a. [Fr. camus, Pr. camusat, flat-nosed, from Celt. cam, crooked, bent.] Depressed; flat; crooked: said only of the nose.

And though my nose be camous'd, my lips thick, And my chin bristled, Pan, great Pan, was such. B. Jonson.

Camounly (ká'mus-li), adv. Awry. Skellon.

Camoy's (ka-moiz'), a. Same as Camous. Sir T. Browne.

Camp (kamp), n. [Fr. camp, a camp, formerly also a field, a parallel form of champ, a field, both being from the L. campus, a plain. Campaign, champion are from this source.] 1. The place where an army or other body of men is or has been encamped; the collection of tents or other erections for the accommodation of a number of men, particularly troops in a temporary station; an encampment; as, to pitch a camp; there are many Roman camps in Britain. When an army in the field is to remain for some time at a particular spot, it may be stationed in an intrenched camp, surrounded by earth-works, redoubts, &c. A flying camp is one occupied for a very brief period. The camps of the ancient Roman soldiers, even though for only a night's stay, were of the intrenched kind, in the shape of a square surrounded by a fosse (fossa), with a stake-faced embankment (vallum) on the inside. There were four gates, one at either side and one at either end, and the interior was divided into streets, the broadest of which, 100 feet wide, ran between the side gates. The other streets, 50 feet wide, ran at right angles to this from end to end of the camp.—Camp of instruction, a camp formed for the reception of troops who are sent to be trained in manœuvring in large bodies and in campaigning duties in general. There is a permanent camp of this kind at Aldershot.—2. Body of troops moving and encamping together; an army.

For I shall sutler be Unto the camp, and profits will accrue. Shak.

The whole had the appearance of a splendid court rather than of a military armament; and in this situation, carrying more show than force with it, the camp arrived at Bernice. Hume.

3. In agri. a heap of turnips, potatoes, or other roots laid up for preserving through the winter. In some places called a Pie, in others a Bury.

Camp (kamp), v.t. 1. To put into or lodge in a camp, as an army; to encamp. [Rare.] 2. To afford camping ground for; to afford rest or lodging to. [Rare.]

Had our great palace the capacity To camp this host, we would all sup together. Shak.

3. To bury in pits, as potatoes; to pit. Louden. [Local.]

Camp (kamp), v.i. To live in a camp, as an army; to encamp.—To camp out, to live in a camp: especially applied to volunteers from their usually living in houses.

Are they also to build their own houses or to camp out in tents? Saturday Rev.

Camp (kamp), n. [A. Sax. camp, Dan. kamp, G. kampf, a fight, a contest, all, according to Skeat, from L. campus, a plain, and in late times a battle.] An ancient English form of the game of football. It was played by two parties of twelve men, ranged in two lines 120 yards apart. A ball was laid in the middle, and, on a given signal, each party rushed forward to kick or throw it to the opposite goal. The contest generally involved kicked shins, and sometimes serious injury.

or resources, as physical strength, intellectual power, knowledge, experience, skill, dexterity, patience, fortitude, inclination, legal, moral, or social right, wealth, or the like, necessary for the attainment of any end or the accomplishment of any purpose, the specific end or purpose being indicated by the verb with which can is joined.

Can the fig-tree bear olive berries? John 15: 5.
God thoughtest ungratefully with his voice: great things doest he which we are not comprehending. Job 41: 11.

It is a contradiction to imagine that Camphorotropical can do that, which, if it could be done, would render all power insignificant. Fullerton.

There about me my I did it; never think. Shak.
They cry look at me.

[This verb is now used only in the indicative mood, but Chaucer has an infinitive form, canne ('I shall not canne answer,' that is, I shall not be able to answer), and the infinitive is still so used in Scotch in such expressions as, 'I'll no can go, for I shall not be able to go.'—Can but, cannot but. Can but indicates restraint, moral or physical, and is equivalent to, Can do no more than, can only.

He could but cry in proportion to be read, and empty his commences as he only as he filled in. See 17: 10.

Can but, on the other hand, indicates necessity or constraint, especially moral, and is equivalent to, Cannot help doing or being, cannot refrain from.

I cannot but remember such things were. Shak.
That were not common to me.

Yet he could not but acknowledge to himself that there was something calculated to inspire awe, in the sudden appearance and vanishing of the tempest. De Quincy.

—Can away with, to negative pleasure, to be able to endure or put up with.

We are away with our company when dinner goes beyond what cheer and conversation inspire. Locke.

Can't (kan), [A form of can for cannot.] An auxiliary verb of the past tense—did, cannot to Old English and Scotch.

With gentle words he saw his lady go. Spenser.
Alas, alas! the silly lady can cry. See 17: 10.

Canal-lift (ka-nal'-lift), n. A hydro-pneumatic elevator for raising boats from one level of a canal to another.

Canard (ka-nar or ka-nard'), n. [Fr., a duck, from L. canardus a kind of boat, from G. can, a boat or ship.] 1. An absurd story which one attempts to impose on his hearers or readers, a fabricated story to which currency is given by some newspapers. This name comes, according to Littré, from an old French phrase signifying 'to half-mill a duck,' in which the words meaning 'half' came to be employed. It is clear that to half-mill a duck is not to sell it at all, whence the sense of cheating, making a fool of. Cotgrave gives the term canard de canards a canard (one who half-mill ducks) as meaning a swearer or liar. — 2. A broadside fired in the streets, from the generally sensational nature of its contents.

Canarium (ka-na-ri-um), n. [From canari, an eastern name.] A genus of plants, native to the Canaries, consisting of lofty trees which exude resin or balsam. The exudation of one species resembles in its quality the balsam of capivi, that of another is so like copal that it is used as a varnish in place of it. Dioscorides or dioscorus is a brownish resin obtained from C. striatum. C. canarium yields a fruit much prized in Java, from which an oil is expressed which is used at table and for lamps.

Canary (ka-na-ri), n. 1. Wine made in the Canary Islands. 2. An old dance introduced into Spain from the Canary Islands, and thence brought to England.

I have seen a melody That's able to breathe life into a stone. Quintus a cork, and make you dance canary. Shak.

3. A canary-bird. — 4. A word put by Shakespeare in its singular and plural forms in the mouth of Mrs. Quickly (Merry Wives), and which commentators differ in explaining. It is probably a blunder for quandary.

Canary (ka-na-ri), v. i. To dance, to frolic; to perform the old dance called a canary.

Ye got a tune at the singer's end, canary to it with your feet, because it was tending up your eyelids. Shak.

Canary-bird (ka-na-ri-bird), n. An insouciant singing bird, a kind of finch, from the Canary Islands, the Carduelis canaria, or Pringilla canaria, family Pringillidae. These birds are now bred in other countries.

and are dispersed everywhere as chamber-birds. They were introduced into Europe 300 or 400 years ago. The canary produces music with allied species, as the goldfinch, siskin, linnet, bull-finch.

Canary-finch (ka-na-ri-finch), n. The canary-bird.

Canary-grass (ka-na-ri-grass), n. Phalaris canariensis, nat. order Gramineae, a native of the Canary Isles. Its seed is used as food in the Canaries, Barbary, and Italy, and is largely collected for canary-birds. It is cultivated for this last purpose in Kent and Essex.

Canary-seed (ka-ná'ri-séd), n. The seed of the canary-grass, used for feeding birds.

Canary-stone (ka-ná'ri-stón), n. A very beautiful and somewhat rare variety of carnelian, so named from its yellow colour.

Canary-wood (ka-ná'ri-wúd), n. [From its colour resembling that of the canary-bird.] A wood of a light orange colour, straight and close in the grain, adapted for the purposes of the cabinet-maker and turner. It is imported into England from the Brazils under the name of Madeira mahogany. It is the wood of Persea indica and P. canariensis.

Canaster (ka-nas'tér), n. [Fr. canastro, Sp. canastro, a basket. Same word as Canister.] 1. The rush basket in which tobacco is packed in South America. Hence—2. A kind of tobacco for smoking, consisting of the dried leaves coarsely broken.

Can-buoy (kan'bol or bwol), n. A large cone-shaped, floating buoy, generally painted, as a mark for shoals, &c. See BUOY.

Cancan (kan'kan), n. [L. quancum, although. In the schools of the middle ages the proper pronunciation of this word was the subject of fierce contention, one party pronouncing it can-can, and the other quancum; hence it came to signify tittle-tattle, gossip, scandal, undue familiarity.] A kind of French dance performed by men and women, who indulge in extravagant postures and lascivious gestures.

Cancel (kan'sel), v. t. pret. & pp. cancelled; ppr. cancelling. [Fr. cancelier, to cancel; L. cancelare, to furnish with lattice-work, to cancel by drawing lines across in the form of lattice-work, from cancelli, a lattice, whence chancel, chancellor, &c.] 1. To inclose with lattice-work or a railing.

A little obscure place cancelled in with iron-work is the pillar or stump at which . . . our Saviour was scourged. Evelyn.

2. To draw lines across (something written) so as to deface; to blot out or obliterate; as, to cancel several lines in a manuscript.—3. To annul or destroy; to throw aside; as, to cancel an obligation or a debt. 'The indentures were cancelled.' Thackeray.

Know then, I here forget all former griefs, Cancel all grudge. Shak.

4. Specifically, (a) in math. to strike out a common factor, as from the numerator and denominator of a fraction; as, by canceling 2 in the fraction $\frac{2}{4}$ we obtain the equivalent fraction $\frac{1}{2}$. (b) In printing, to throw aside any portion of a printed work, as single leaves or whole sheets, &c., and print it afresh.—SYN. To blot out, obliterate, deface, erase, efface, expunge, annul, abolish, revoke, abrogate, repeal, destroy, do away, set aside.

Cancel (kan'sel), n. [See CANCEL, CANCELLI.] 1. Lattice-work, or one of the cross bars in lattice-work; a lattice-work or grated inclosure; hence a barrier; a limit.

A prison is but a retirement, and opportunity of serious thoughts to a person whose spirit . . . desires no enlargement beyond the cancels of the body. Jer. Taylor.

2. In printing, the suppression and reprinting of a page or more of a work; the part thus altered.

Cancel (kan'sel), v. i. To become obliterated or void. 'A rash oath that cancel'd in the making.' Cowley. [Rare.]

Canceleer (kan-se-lér), v. i. [Fr. chancelier, to be unsteady, to waver, lit. to go in zig-zags, from L. cancelli, lattice-work.] In falconry, to turn two or three times on the wing before seizing, as a hawk in stooping, especially when it misses.

He makes his stoop; but, wanting breath, is forced To canceleer. Massinger.

Canceleer (kan-se-lér), n. The turn of a hawk upon the wing to recover itself, after missing in the first stoop.

The fierce and eager hawks, down thrilling from the skies, sions, as by cancelli; specifically, (a) marked with lines crossing each other; marked lattice-wise.
Make sundry canceleers ere they the fowl can reach. Drayton.

The tail of the castor is almost bald, though the beast is very hairy; and cancellated with some resemblance to the scales of fishes. N. Grew.

(b) In anat. containing cancelli having a peculiar kind of cellular structure, as certain portions of bones. (c) In bot. a term applied to leaves consisting entirely of veins, without connecting parenchyma, so that the whole leaf looks like a sheet of open net-work. Called also Cancellous.

Cancellation (kan-sel-lá'shon), n. The act of cancelling.

Cancelli (kan-sel'li), n. pl. [L. a lattice, inclosure, balustrade, grating, &c.] Lattice-work; specifically, (a) in R. Cath. churches, the lattice-work partition between the choir and the body of the church, so constructed as not to intercept the view. (b) In compar. anat. the lattice-like cellular or spongy texture of bones, especially at the ends of long bones, and consisting of numerous spaces communicating with each other.

Cancellous (kan-sel-lus), a. Same as Cancellate. 'The cancellous texture of the bones.' Owen.

Cancer (kan'sér), n. [L.] 1. The crab genus, a genus of ten-footed, anomalous or short-tailed crustaceans, now used to include only the common European edible crab (C. pagurus) and a few allied species in North and South America and New Zealand. See CRAB. 2. In astron. one of the twelve signs of the zodiac, represented by the form of a crab, and limiting the sun's course northward in summer; hence, the sign of the summer solstice.—Tropic of Cancer. See TROPIC.—3. A morbid growth or structure which can extend itself and form again after removal, arising from a vitiated constitution and ending in ulceration: so called from the resemblance of the tumour, traversed by red markings, to a crab with extended claws. Cancer is divided into scirrhus, encephaloid, colloid, and epithelial cancer. Scirrhus cancer is a hard, firm, incompressible, and nodulated mass, at first non-adherent to the skin and attended with little or no pain. On section it is smooth and glistening, and exudes, on pressure, a small quantity of milky-looking juice. Encephaloid cancer is a soft elastic tumour, less circumscribed and increasing more rapidly than the preceding. It ends in a fungous vascular ulcer, to which the term fungus hæmatodes has been given, and which has a great tendency to bleed. Colloid cancer occurs most frequently in the stomach and alimentary canal, and consists of fibres arranged so as to form loculi, which contain a soft viscous matter of a yellowish, grayish, or reddish colour. Epithelial cancer, occurring on the skin and mucous membranes, commences as a hard little tubercle, often resembling a wart, and like the other varieties ends in an ulcer with an ichorous discharge.—Cancer bandage, a bandage resembling a crab in the number of its legs, and called the split-cloth of eight tails.

Canorousness (ka-nô'rus-ness), n. Musicalness.

Cant (kant), v. i. [From L. canto, freq. of canto, to sing.] 1. To speak with a whining voice or in an affected or assumed tone; to assume a particular tone and manner of speaking for the purpose of begging or exciting compassion; hence, to beg.—2. To make whining pretensions to goodness; to affect piety without sincerity; to sham holiness.—3. To talk in a certain special jargon; to use the words and phraseology peculiar to a particular sect, party, profession, and the like.

The Doctor here,
When he discourseth of dissection,
Of vena cava and of vena porta,
Of miserere and the mesentericum,
What does he else but cant? B. Jonson.

Cant (kant), n. 1. A whining or singing manner of speech; specifically, the whining speech of beggars, as in asking alms and making complaints of their distresses.—2. The language or jargon spoken by gipsies, thieves, professional beggars, and the like, and containing many words different from ordinary English; a kind of slang or argot.—3. The words and phrases peculiar to or characteristic of a sect, party, or profession; the dialect of a sect or set of people.

Of all the cants which are current in this canting world, though the cant of hypocrisy may be the worst, the cant of criticism is the most tormenting. Stevens.

4. A pretentious assumption of a religious character without sincerity; a hypocritical addition to the use of religious phrases, &c.; religious phrases hypocritically used.

That he (Richard Cromwell) was a good man, he evinced by proofs more satisfactory than deep groans or long sermons, by humility and severity when he was at the height of human greatness, by cheerful resignation under cruel wrongs and misfortunes; but the cant then common in every guard-room gave him a disgust which he had not always the prudence to conceal. Macaulay.

Cant (kant), a. Of the nature of cant or slang; as, a cant word or phrase.

The affectation of some late authors to introduce and multiply cant words is the most ruinous corruption in any language. Swift.

Cant (kant), n. Something given in charity. [Vagabonds' slang.]

Cant (kant), n. [Fr. encan, O. Fr. encant, incant, a call for bids at auction—en, in, to, and O. Fr. cant, for L. quantum, how much; lit. to how much (will you bid)? A call for bidders at an auction; the act of crying out things for sale by auction.

Numbers of these tenants are now offering to sell their leases by cant. Swift.

Cant (kant), v. t. [See the noun.] 1. To offer for sale by auction; to sell by auction.

It is not the general method of landlords to cant their land to the highest bidder. Swift.

2. To determine by bidding at an auction.

When two monks were outwitting each other in canting the price of an abbey, he (William Rufus) observed a third at some distance, who said never a word; the king demanded why he would not offer; the monk said he was poor, and besides would give nothing, if he were ever so rich; the king replied, then you are the fittest person to have it, and immediately gave it him. Swift.

Cant (kant), n. [Same word as Dan. Sw. and D. kant, edge, border, margin, &c.; G. kante, a side, a border or brim; O. Fr. cant, corner, angle (from this meaning 1 may be borrowed); also It. Sp. Pg. canto, side, edge, &c. The origin of the word is obscure.] 1. A corner or retired place; an angle; a niche.

The principal person in the temple was Irene or Peace; she was placed aloft in a cant. B. Jonson.

2. An external or salient angle. A bolt with a head having six angles is said to be six-canted.—3. One of the segments forming a side-piece in the head of a cask.—4. A segment of the rim of a wooden cog-wheel.—5. An inclination from a horizontal line; as, to be on the cant.—6. A toss, thrust, or push with a sudden jerk; as, to give a ball a cant.

Cant (kant), v. t. 1. To turn about or over by a sudden push or thrust; as, to cant over a pall or cask.—2. To toss; as, to cant a ball.—3. To cut off an angle, as of a square piece of timber.—4. Naut. to turn (anything) so as to be no longer fair or square; to give a ship an inclination to one side so as to prepare her for being careened.

Cant (kant), a. A colloquial contraction of can not.

Cantab (kan-tab'), n. and a. An abbreviation of Cantabrigian. 'The rattle-pated trick of a young Cantab.' Sir W. Scott.

Capillare (káp-i-lá-ré), n. [Fr. capillaire, the maiden hair fern, and a syrup from it, from L. capillus, capillary.] Originally a kind of syrup prepared with maiden-hair fern, but now applied to any simple syrup, as of sugar or honey flavoured with orange flowers, or orange-flower water.

Capillament (káp-i-lá-men-t), n. [L. capillum, anything like hair.] A filament or fine fibre, specifically, in bot. the filament, the stalk of the stamen, a small fine thread like a hair. "The solid capillaments of the nerves." Sp. Barbery.

Capillaries (káp-i-lá-rí-tes or káp-i-lá-rí-tes), n. The state of being capillary; capillarity. [Rare.]

Capillarity (káp-i-lá-rí-tí), n. The state or condition of being capillary.

Capillary (káp-i-lá-rí or káp-i-lá-rí), n. [L. capillus, from capillus, hair, from root of caput, the head.] 1. Resembling a hair, fine, minute, small in diameter though long; filiform, as, a capillary tube or pipe, a capillary vessel in animal bodies, such as the ramifications of the blood-vessels — 2. Specifically, in bot. resembling hair in the manner of growth, applied in this sense by Ray, Bombarda, and others to ferns.

Capillary or capillaceous plants are such as have no main stalk or stem, but grow to the ground, as hairs on the head, and which bear their seeds in little tufts or protuberances on the backside of their leaves. Gray.

3. Pertaining to capillary tubes, or to the capillary vessels or capillaries in organic structures; as, capillary action. — Capillary tubes are tubes with very small bores, of which the diameter is only a half, a third, a fourth, &c., of a line. If a tube of this sort, open at both ends, be taken and one of its ends immersed in water, the water will rise within the tube to a sensible height above the surface of the water in the vessel, the height being inversely as the diameter of the bore, or the smaller the bore the greater the height. Different liquids rise in capillary tubes to different heights. The rise is owing to the attraction (called capillary attraction) which subsists between the fluid and the matter of the tube, consequently those liquids which do not adhere to or wet glass do not rise in capillary tubes of that material, but on the contrary stand lower within than without, thus, water, alcohol, ether, oil, &c., rise in narrow tubes of glass, metal, &c., having the surface clean, but if the surface is greased depression takes place instead of elevation. Mercury, on the other hand, is depressed in a glass tube, but rises in one of tin, to which it can adhere. Capillary attraction is exhibited in numerous instances in nature, as in the rising of the sap in vegetables and in the circulation of fluids in the porous tissues of animal bodies. The oil or grease rises in the wick of a lamp or candle by this principle. — Capillary repulsion, the repulsion which is exhibited when a capillary tube is dipped into mercury, so that the fluid stands lower within the tube than without. — Capillary vessels, in med. the minute ramifications of the arteries and other vessels. They are also termed Capillaries.

Capillary (káp-i-lá-rí or káp-i-lá-rí), n. 1. A tube with a small bore; specifically, a minute blood-vessel constituting the termination of an artery or vein, one of the minute vessels which intervene between the terminal arteries and veins. The diameter of the human capillaries in muscular tissue averages $\frac{1}{1000}$ of a line — 2. In bot. a fern, especially applied to such ferns as grow like tufts of hair on walls. See the adjective. See F. Brown.

Capillature (káp-i-lá-tár), n. A bush of hair, fringing of the hair. [Rare.]

Capilliform (káp-i-lá-fór-m), n. [L. capillus, a hair, and forma, form.] In the shape or form of a hair or of hairs, as, a capilliform fibre.

Capillitium (káp-i-lá-shí-um), n. [L. capillus, a hair.] In bot. a kind of pore or urt in which the spores of some fungi are retained.

Capillous (káp-i-lús), n. [See CAPILLARY.] Hairy, abounding with hair.

Capistrum (káp-i-strum), n. [L. capistrum, a halter, muzzle.] In eury. a name given to several kinds of headgear for the head.

Capital (káp-i-tál), n. 1. L. capitale, capital, doubly, also pre-existent, from caput, the head.] 1. Resisting to the head, on the head.

with a spacious court in the middle. Though caravansaries in the East serve in place of inns, there is this radical difference between them that, generally speaking, the traveller finds nothing in a caravansary for the use either of himself or his cattle. He must carry all his provisions and necessaries along with him. Those built in towns serve not only as inns, but contain shops, warehouses, and even exchanges.

Caravel, Carvel (kár-á'vél, kár-á'vél'), n. [Sp. and It. caravela, a caravel, dim. of L. carubus, Gr. karabos, a light ship, a boat, also a crab.] A small name of different kinds of vessels. One variety used in Portugal is a vessel of 100 to 150 tons burden, another is a sailing vessel of 10 to 15 tons, and a third a large Turkish ship of war.

Carrot of the fifteenth century.

The name was also given to a small ship used by the Spaniards and Portuguese in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries for long voyages. It was narrow at the poop, wide at the bow, and carried a double lower at its stern and a single one at its bow. It had four masts and a bowsprit, and the principal sails were lateen sails. It was in command of three such caravels that Columbus crossed the Atlantic and discovered America.

Caraway (kár-á'wá'), n. [Sp. al-carawayo, from Ar. karawig, karawig, caraway, probably from Gr. karon, L. carum, caraway. See CARVY.] 1. Carum Carui, nat. order Umbelliferae, a biennial plant, with a taper root like a parsnip, which, when young, is used like carrots or parsnips, but it has a strong flavour. The seeds, which are property the fruit, have an aromatic smell and a warm pungent taste. They are used to flavour cakes, also in confits, and the volatile oil is obtained by distilling them in spirits. —2. A kind of sweetmeat containing caraway seeds. —3. A kind of apple.

Caraway-cumst (kár-á'wá-kumst'), n. A sweetmeat containing caraway.

Carbamide (kár-á'bíd'), n. [Carbon and amide.] A compound having the formula $\text{CH}_3\text{N}_2\text{O}$. It is obtained by the action of ammonia on oxychloride of carbon. This substance seems to be identical with urea.

Carboxate (kár-á'kót'), n. A salt formed by the union of carbonic acid with a base.

Carboxotic Acid (kár-á'kót-ik á'síd'), n. ($\text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{N}_2\text{O}_4$) [Carbon and acids.] A crystallizable acid and bitter substance, obtained by the action of nitric acid on indigo and some other animal and vegetable substances. It is of great importance in dyeing. When alkali, which has been treated with a mordant of alum or cream of tartar, is immersed in a solution of this acid, it is dyed of a beautiful permanent yellow colour. Often called Picric Acid.

Carbide (kár-á'bíd'), n. A compound of carbon with a metal, the usual effect of which is to render it hard and brittle. Formerly called Carbure.

Carbide, n. See CARBIDE.

Carbide (kár-á'bíd'), n. See CARBIDE.

Carbohydrate (kár-á'bíd-hí-drát'), n. [Carbon and hydrate.] An organic compound containing carbon and the elements of water, such as starch and cellulose. Ure.

Carbo-hydrogen (kár-á'bíd-hí-dró-jen'), n. Same as Hydro-carbon.

Carotus (kar-otus), n. [A word common to the Teutonic languages (comp. D. carper, Dan. carpe, Sw. carp) and borrowed by the Romance tongues.] A teleostean fish of the family Cyprinidae. The type is the common carp (Cyprinus carpio), said to have been introduced into England in the fourteenth century. It is an excellent fish for ponds, as it breeds rapidly (as many as 100,000 eggs having been counted in the ovaries of a single carp), grows to a large size, sometimes attaining the length of 5 feet, and lives, it is said, for 120 or 200 years. In old age its scales become gray and white. The golden carp or gold fish is C. auratus, and the crucian or German carp C. crucianus. See CARCIAS in midst, to gain possession of by force; to capture, as, he will carry the island.—9. To extend or continue in any direction, in time, in space, or in a figurative sense: most commonly with an adverb or preposition, such as up, back, forward, &c., as, he carried his history back to the origins of the empire.

His chimney is carried up through the whole rock, so that you see the sky through it.
Addison.

Nothing short of a miracle could carry for the improvements which have been accomplished and in part begun.
Brougham.

10. To refer to a distant point in time: with up, down, forward, &c.

Meanwhile, that while of the Egyptians, hath carried up their government to an indefinite distance.
Sir M. Hale.

11. To support or sustain, without the idea of motion.

Carry comestible . . . upon sticks. Bacon.

Hence, to bear, as trees do. [Rare.]

Set them a reasonable depth, and they will carry more shoots upon the stem.
Bacon.

12. To bear; to have in or on; to show or exhibit, to import or have a certain taint; to contain or comprise.

hypocrisy, or folly for men to quit or renounce their former errors, precisely upon the offer of an argument, which they cannot immediately answer.
Locke.

13. To manage, to conduct; as, to carry matters with a high hand. With the reflexive pronoun, to behave.

He carried himself so insolently in the house, and out of the house, to all persons, that he became odious.
Clarendon.

[Formerly common but now little used, bear one's self being now more common.]—To carry coals, to bear injuries; to put up with an affront.

Gregory, as my word, we'll not carry much. Shak.

—To carry mails to Nonconatus, to take things to a place where they already abound; to lose one's labour.—To carry it off, to bear out; to face through, to braver a thing out.

If a man carries it off, there is no much money saved.

out; said of the one of the two last batsmen on one side, who, though not put out, has to cease playing when his partner is put out.—To carry out, (a) to bear from within.

When I have said good night for evermore.
And you see me carried out from the threshold of the door.
Tennyson.

(b) To sustain to the end; to continue to the end; to accomplish, to finish; to execute, as, he carried out his purpose.—To carry the wind, in the manege, to turn the nose as high as the ears, said of a horse.—To carry the world before one, to meet with uninterrupted success, to be very successful.—To carry through, to support to the end; to sustain or keep from falling or being subdued.

Grace will carry a man through all difficulties.
Hawthorne.

Carry (kar'i), v. t. 1. To act as a bearer; as, the horse was carrying double, that is, had two persons mounted on it.—2. In hunting, to run on ground, or over frost, which sticks to the feet, as a hare.—3. To bear the head in a particular manner, as a horse. When a horse holds his head high, with an arching neck, he is said to carry well. When he lowers his head too much, he is said to carry low.—4. To convey; to propel, as, a gun or mortar carries well.—To carry on, to conduct one's self in a wild, reckless manner; to riot; to frolic; as, he carries on at a great rate. (Colloq.)
